DUNGLISON'S
MEDICAL DICTIONARY

WORKS BY THE SAME AUTHOR.

I. (JUST ISSUED.)

HUMAN PHYSIOLOGY:

With Five Hundred and Thirty-two Handsome Illustrations on Wood.

EIGHTH EDITION, REVISED, MODIFIED, AND ENLARGED.

In two large and handsome octavo volumes, of about 1500 pages; leather, price, $7.

In preparing the present edition, "no pains have been spared to make the work a complete expression of the science of the day." This statement our own examination of the work enables us to confirm; every page of it testifying to the author's industry in culling from various quarters and sources all that was valuable in the physiological contributions to science of the last few years. The careful and scrutinizing spirit exhibited by the writer when investigating mooted questions, the extensive information he possesses of general science in almost every department, and the clear and happy style in which he presents his views, render his Physiology one of the most reliable and attractive works in our language. To the practitioner and general reader, we can heartily recommend it as an excellent résumé of the present state of physiological science. As a text-book for the student, we think it has no superior in our language, and for this object we presume it was chiefly, if not expressly written.—Med. Examiner, Oct., 1856.

II. (NOW READY, JULY, 1857.)

GENERAL THERAPEUTICS AND MATERIA MEDICA:

ADAPTED FOR A MEDICAL TEXT-BOOK.

WITH ABOUT TWO HUNDRED ILLUSTRATIONS.

SIXTH EDITION, REVISED AND IMPROVED.

In two very handsome octavo volumes, of about 1100 pages; leather, price $6.

The most complete and satisfactory exponent of the existing state of Therapeutical Science, within the moderate limits of a text-book, of any hitherto published. What gives the work a superior value, in our judgment, is the happy blending of Therapeutics and Materia Medica, as they are or ought to be taught in all our Medical schools; going no further into the nature and commercial history of drugs than is indispensable for the medical student. This gives to the treatise a clinical and practical character, calculated to benefit, in the highest degree, both students and practitioners. We shall adopt it as a text-book for our classes, while pursuing this branch of medicine, and shall be happy to learn that it has been adopted as such in all of our medical institutions.—The N. Y. Journal of Medicine.

III. (JUST ISSUED.)

NEW REMEDIES:

WITH FORMULÆ FOR THEIR PREPARATION AND ADMINISTRATION.

Seventh Edition, with extensive Additions.

In one very large octavo volume, of 770 pages; leather, $3.75.

It may be considered almost a work of super-erogation to enter into an elaborate criticism of a work which has reached its seventh edition. The public has pronounced, in the most authoritative manner, its verdict, and we are certainly not disposed in the present instance to dispute its decision. In truth, such books as this will always be favorably received by the Profession of our country. They are labor-saving productions, which, at the expense of much research and reading to the author, condense in a convenient space the novelties and discoveries of the age. The present edition of this work is considerably enlarged and improved. The author, with his accustomed accuracy, has elaborated and amplified many of the articles but casually or imperfectly treated of in the former editions; and he has also added considerably to the list of new remedies. About thirty new agents, or novel applications of old remedies, are introduced to the notice of the reader in this edition.—Va. Med. and Surg. Jour., Sept., 1856.

IV.

THE PRACTICE OF MEDICINE.

A TREATISE ON SPECIAL PATHOLOGY AND THERAPEUTICS.

THIRD AND REVISED EDITION.

In two large octavo volumes, of about 1500 pages; leather, $6.25.

The student of medicine will find in these two elegant volumes a mine of facts, a gathering of precepts and advice from the world of experience, that will nerve him with courage, and faithfully direct him in his efforts to relieve the physical sufferings of the race.—Boston Med. and Surg. Jour.

P R E F A C E .

ON this new edition of his "Medical Lexicon," the author has bestowed more than usual labour. It is not more than four years since a friendly reviewer, in one of the most learned of European medical periodicals, (the "British and Foreign Medico-Chirurgical Review" for July, 1853, p. 205,) in noticing a former edition, remarked, that the labour which had been bestowed upon the work had "been something prodigious;" adding — "the work, however, has been now done, and we are happy in the thought, that no human being will have again to undertake the same gigantic task. Revised and corrected from time to time, Dr. Dunglison's 'Medical Lexicon' will last for centuries."

Yet, in the present edition, not only has the work been "revised and corrected," but about six thousand subjects and terms have been added, which are not to be found in the one noticed by the "British and Foreign." Many of these have been introduced into medical terminology in consequence of the progress of the science; whilst others had escaped the author in the previous editions. These additions have necessarily required a great amount of labour, which—as on every former occasion of the kind—has been cheerfully bestowed, in order that the work might be rendered still more worthy of the vast favour which it has experienced. It has ever been the anxious desire of the author to make it a satisfactory and desirable—if not indispensable—lexicon, in which the student may search without disappointment for every term that has been legitimated in the nomenclature of the science; and the present very carefully revised, greatly enlarged, and accurately printed edition cannot fail to be more extensively useful, and to offer stronger claims to the attention of the practitioner and student, than any of its predecessors.

The author is grateful for the opportunity again afforded him of expressing his acknowledgments for the reception which the Dictionary has met with everywhere from the profession.

T O T H E S E C O N D E D I T I O N .

THE present undertaking was suggested by the frequent complaints, made by the author's pupils, that they were unable to meet with information on numerous topics of professional inquiry,—especially of recent introduction,—in the medical dictionaries accessible to them.

It may, indeed, be correctly affirmed, that we have no dictionary of medical subjects and terms which can be looked upon as adapted to the state of the science. In proof of this, the author need but remark, that he has found occasion to add several thousand medical terms, which are not to be met with in the only medical lexicon at this time in circulation in the country.

The present edition will be found to contain many hundred more terms than the first, and to have experienced numerous additions and modifications.

The author's object has not been to make the work a mere lexicon or dictionary of terms, but to afford, under each, a condensed view of its various medical relations, and thus to render the work an epitome of the existing condition of medical science. In its preparation, he has freely availed himself of the English, French, and German works of the same nature, and has endeavored to add every subject and term of recent introduction, which has fallen under his notice; yet, with all his care, it will doubtless be found that subjects have been omitted. The numerous additions, however, which he has made, and his strong desire to be useful, "by removing rubbish and clearing obstructions from the paths through which learning and genius press forward to conquest and glory," will, he trusts, extenuate these and other objections that might be urged against the work; especially when the toil, which every compiler of a dictionary must endure, is taken into consideration; a toil which has been so forcibly depicted by the great English Lexicographer, as well as by the distinguished SCALIGER :

“Si quelqu'un a commis quelque crime odieux,
S'il a tué son père, ou blasphémé les Dieux,
Qu'il fasse un Lexicon: s'il est supplice au monde
Qui le punisse mieux, je veux que l'on me tonde.”

EXPLANATION.

If the simple synonymy of any term be needed, a mere reference to the term may be sufficient ; but if farther information be desired, it may be obtained under the term referred to. For example, the French word Tronc is said to be synonymous with Trunk. This may be sufficient for the inquirer : should it not, the requisite information may be found by turning to Trunk.

This aberration in the human eye is corrected by the iris, which does not permit the rays to fall near the circumference of the lens, and also by the crystalline lens itself, which, owing to its structure, serves the purposes of an achromatic glass.

ABERRATION, SPHERICAL, Aberration of sphericity.

ABERRATION OF SPHERICITY or spherical aberration takes place, when the rays, as in a common lens, which pass through the centre of the lens, and those which pass near the circumference, are unequally refracted, so that they do not meet at a common focus.

A medicine used for absorbing acidity in the stomach and bowels, as magnesia, chalk, &c. Inver'tens, Resor'bens, Sat'urans, Præcip'itans.

ABSORP'TION, Absorp'tio, Resorp'tio, Inhal'tio, Imbibit'io, Anar'rophê, Anarrophe'sis, Catapino'sis, Rhoëbde'sis, Catarrhophê'sis, Cata'r'rophê; same etymon. The function of absorbent vessels, by virtue of which they take up substances from without or within the body. Two great divisions have been made of this function.

1. External absorption, or the absorption of composition, which obtains, from without the organs, the materials intended for their composition; and, 2. Internal absorption, or the absorption of decomposition, which takes up from the organs the materials that have to be replaced by the exhalants.

By external absorption is meant not only that which takes place at the external surface of the body, but also that of the mucous membranes of the digestive and respiratory passages. Hence, again, the division of external absorption into cutaneous—resorp'tio cuta'nea seu cutis, inhala'tio cutis,—intestinal or digestive, and pulmonary or respiratory.

Internal absorption is also subdivided into, 1. Molecular or interstitial, nutritive, organic, or decomposing, which takes up from each organ the materials that constitute it, so that the decomposition is always in equilibrio with the deposition. 2. The absorption of recremential secreted fluids, such as the fluid of serous membranes, synovia, &c. As these are constantly exhaled on surfaces which have no external outlet, they would augment indefinitely, if absorption did not remove them in the same proportion as that in which they are deposited. 3. The absorption of a part of the excremential fluids, as they pass over the excretory passages.

Absorption does not effect the decomposition of the body immediately. It merely prepares the fluid which has to be eliminated by the secretory organs.

The great agents of external absorption are the veins and chyliiferous vessels; of internal absorption, probably the lymphatics. In the chyliiferous vessels and lymphatics the fluid is always found to possess the same general properties. In them, therefore, an action of elaboration or selection must have taken place. The veins, on the other hand, seem to exert no selection. Any fluid, possessing the necessary tenuity, passes through the coats of the vessel readily by imbibition, and proceeds along with the torrent of the circulation. Watery fluids in this manner enter the blood when they are taken into the stomach. Substances that require digestion, on the other hand, must pass through the chyliiferous vessels and thoracic duct.

It is stimulant, rubefacient, and escharotic, and is applied to the nostrils in syncope, asphyxia, headache, &c. It destroys warts.

An Aromatic Spirit of Vinegar, Ac'idum Aceticum Camphoratum, A. acetosum camphoratum, is formed of this strong acid, f $\frac{3}{4}$ x; Camphor, $\frac{3}{4}$ j; Alcohol, f $\frac{3}{4}$ j.

A strong Acetic Acid was ordered by the London pharmacopœia, prepared from wood. It was called Vinegar of wood, Improved distilled Vinegar, Pyroligneous Acid, Acetum Ligno'rum, and its strength was such, that 87 gr. of crystallized subcarbonate of soda should saturate 100 grains of the acid.

By others, however, the terms are applied to Pyroxylic Spirit. A limpid, colourless liquid, having a peculiarly penetrating and slightly empyreumatic odour. Its density in the liquid state, is almost the same as that of alcohol, 0.7921. Its taste is disagreeable, and analogous to that of peppermint. It is miscible in all proportions with water, alcohol, and ether. It may be prepared by distilling a mixture of two parts of crystallized acetate of lead and one part of quicklime in a salt-glaze jar (gray-beard,) the lower part of the jar being coated with fire-clay; and a bent glass tube, half an inch in diameter, adapted to the mouth by a cork, so as to form a distillatory apparatus. The jar is supported on the mouth of a small furnace, by which the lower part only is heated to redness, and the vapours are conducted into a Liebig's condenser. The product is repeatedly redistilled from quicklime, until its boiling point is constant at 132°.

It has been brought forward as a remedy in phthisis pulmonalis; but evidently with unfounded pretensions. It is an excitant, and may be serviceable in chronic bronchitis. The dose is ten to forty drops three times a day, diluted with water.

Willan and Bateman have adopted the term in their Nosology of cutaneous diseases, and placed it in the order TUBERCULA. Aene, with them, is an eruption of distinct, hard, inflamed tubercles, sometimes continuing for a considerable length of time, and sometimes suppurating slowly and partially. They usually appear on the forehead, temples, and chin, and are common to both sexes; but the most severe forms are seen in young men. Air is essentially composed of two gases, oxygen and nitrogen, in the proportion of 20 of the former to 80 of the latter. Oxygen is the vital portion, but the nitrogen is necessary to dilute it. Air also contains a small portion of carbonic acid gas, and has always floating in it aqueous vapour, different terrestrial emanations, etc. Its effects upon the human body vary according to its greater or less density, temperature, moisture, etc.; hence, change of air is found extremely serviceable in the prevention and cure of certain morbid conditions. Alchemy has also been called Sciencia vel Philosoph'ia Hermet'ica, from an idea that Hermes or Mercury was its inventor.

S., Alcohol is rectified spirit of the specific gravity 0.835. The Dublin college has a spiritus fortior, used in the preparation of certain essences, whose specific gravity is .818. Alcohol, absolute alcohol, of the Edinburgh and Dublin Pharmacopœias, is of specific gravity .797.

Alcohol is an inflammable liquor, lighter than water, of a warm, acrid taste, colourless, transparent, and of a pungent, aromatic smell. It is the product of the distillation of vinous liquors; is miscible with water in all proportions, and is the direct solvent of resins, balsams, &c. Various other vegetable principles are soluble in it, and hence it is used, in different states of concentration, in the preparation of elixirs, tinctures, essences, &c.

Alcohol acts on the animal body as a powerful stimulus: as such, in a dilute form, it is used in the prevention and cure of disease. Its habitual and inordinate use is the cause of many serious affections, of a chronic character especially, as visceral obstructions, dropsy, &c.

(F.) Aliment, Nourriture, from alere, 'to nourish.' Food. Any substance which, if introduced into the system, is capable of nourishing it and repairing its losses.

The study of aliments forms one of the most important branches of hygiene. They are confined to the organized kingdom,—the mineral affording none.

As regards the immediate principles which predominate in their composition, they have been classed, but imperfectly, as follows:—

TABLE OF ALIMENTS.

1. Feculaceous.	{	Wheat, barley, oats, rye, rice, Indian corn, potato, sago, peas, beans, &c.
2. Mucilaginous.		Carrot, salsify, beet, turruip, asparagus, cabbage, lettuce, artichoke, melon, &c.
3. Saccharine.	{	Sugar, fig, date, raisin, apricot, &c. Orange, currant, gooseberry, cherry, peach, strawberry, raspberry, mulberry, prune, pear, apple, sorrel, &c.
4. Acidulous.		Cocoa, olive, sweet almond, nut, walnut, animal fat, oil, butter, &c.
5. Oleaginous and Fatty.	{	Different kinds of milk, cheese.
6. Casuous.		Tendon, aponeurosis, true skin, cellular texture; very young animals.
7. Gelatinous.	{	Brain, nerve, eggs, &c.
8. Albuminous.		Flesh and blood.
9. Fibrinous.

Dr. Prout has four great classes—the aqueous, saccharine, oleaginous, and albuminous:—Dr. Pereira, twelve—the aqueous, mucilaginous or gummy, saccharine, amylaceous, ligneous, pectinaceous, acidulous, alcoholic, oily or fatty, proteinaceous, gelatinous, and saline.

Liebig divides them into two classes:—the NITROGENIZED or PLASTIC ELEMENTS OF NUTRITION, in which he comprises vegetable fibrin, vegetable albumen, vegetable casein, flesh and blood; and the NON-NITROGENIZED ELEMENTS OF RESPIRATION, in which he comprises fat, starch, gum, cane sugar, grape sugar, sugar of milk, pectin, bassorin, wine, beer and spirits. The former alone, in his view, are inservient to the nutrition of organized tissue: the latter are burnt in respiration, and furnish heat.

The following simple arrangement is, perhaps, as little objectionable as any:—

1. Nitrogenized Aliments, (Albuminous, of Prout.)	{	Fibrinous (Glutinous?)
		Albuminous.
		Caseinuous.
2. Non-nitrogenized Aliments,	{	Amylaceous.
		Saccharine.
		Saccharine.
		Oleaginous.

The second division might be still farther simplified, inasmuch as amylaceous aliments are convertible into sugar during the digestive process; and, from both, oleaginous matter may be formed.

It is very apparent in quadrupeds, but not in the human species. As the allantois is developed, its walls become very vascular, and contain the ramifications of what become the umbilical artery and vein, which, by the elongation of the allantois, are brought through the villi of the chorion, into indirect communication with the vessels of the mother.

The patient lying on his mattress, the surgeon passes the linen belts beneath his body, attaching them to the hooks on the ends of the straps, and adjusting the whole at the proper distance and length, so as to balance the body exactly, and then raises it from the mattress by turning the handle of the windlass. (F.) Anesthésique; same etymon. as Anæsthesia. Relating to privation of feeling, as an "anæsthetic agent;" one that prevents feeling. The term is, now, almost restricted to agents, which produce such effect by being received into the lungs in the form of vapours or gases, and passing with the blood to the nervous centres on which their action is exerted. Perhaps, as a general rule, the intellectual faculties first feel their influence, — a sort of intoxication supervening, with imperfect power of regulating the movements; the sensory ganglia become afterwards or simultaneously affected, sensation and motion are suspended, and ultimately, if the quantity inhaled be sufficient, the medulla oblongata has its actions suspended or destroyed, respiration ceases, and death is the consequence. Different agents have been used as anæsthetics by way of inhalation — sulphuric ether, chloroform, chloric ether, compound ether, chlorohydric and nitric ethers, bisulphuret of carbon, chloride of olefiant gas, benzoin, aldehyde, light coal-tar naphtha, &c.; but the first four are alone employed. They have been, and are, greatly used in serious surgical operations, and during parturition; and in such cases, as well as in many diseases, especially of a painful nature, produce the most beneficial results.

ANEURIA, Paralysis.

ANEURISM, Aneurys'ma, Aneurys'mus, Aneuris'ma, Cedma, from ανευρνεω, (ava, and ευρνεω), 'to dilate or distend.' Dilatatio Arteriarum, Ectasia, Emborys'ma, Exangi'a aneuris'ma, Arterieurys'ma, Arterurys'ma, Hæmatocele arterio'sa, Abces'sus spiritu'sus, Arteriec'tasis, (F.) Anévrisme, Aneurisme. Properly, Aneurism signifies a tumour, produced by the dilatation of an artery; but it has been extended to various lesions of arteries, as well as to dilatations of the heart.

There are various kinds of aneurism. The following are the chief:

I. When the blood, which forms the tumour, is enclosed within the dilated coats of the artery. This is the TRUE ANEURISM, Aneurys'ma verum, Hernia Arteriarum, (F.) Anévrisme vrai.

II. When the blood has escaped from the opened artery, it is called SPURIOUS or FALSE ANEURISM, Aneuris'ma spurium, Ruptura Arteriae, Arteriorrhœ'is, Arteriodial'ysis, Echymoma arterio'sum, (F.) Anévrisme faux. The latter is divided into three varieties:

1. Diffused False Aneurism, (F.) Anévrisme faux primitif, diffus, noncirconscrit ou par infiltration, which occurs immediately after the division or rupture of an artery, and consists of an extravasation of blood into the areolar texture of the part.

2. Circumscribed False Aneurism, (F.) Anévrisme faux consécutif, circonscrit ou par épanchement, enkysté ou sacciforme, tumeur hémorrhagiale circonscrite, in which the blood issues from the vessel some time after the receipt of the wound, and forms itself a sac in the neighbouring areolar membrane.

3. Aneurism by Anastomosis, Varicose or Circoid Aneurism, Phlebarteriodial'ysis, Aneurys'ma veno'so-arterio'sum, A. varicosum, (F.) Anévrisme par anastomose ou variqueux, A. par érosion, A. de POTT, A. des plus petites artères, which arises from the simultaneous wounding of an artery and vein;—the arterial blood passing into the vein, and producing a varicose state of it.

III. MIXED ANEURISM, (F.) Anévrisme mixte, is that which arises from the dilatation of one or two of the coats, with division or rupture of the other. Some authors have made two varieties of this:

1. Mixed external Aneurism, where the internal and middle coats are ruptured, and the areolar is dilated.

2. Mixed internal Aneurism, in which the internal coat is dilated, and protrudes, like a hernial sac, through the ruptured middle and outer coats. This variety has been called Aneurys'ma Herni'um Arteriae sistens.

Aneurisms have been termed traumatic or exogenous, and spontaneous, according as they may have been caused by a wound, or have originated spontaneously. The latter, when originating from lesions of the inner coats of arteries, have been termed endog'neous. They have also been divided into internal and external.

The internal aneurisms are situate in the great splanchnic cavities, and occur in the heart and great vessels of the chest, abdomen, &c. Their diagnosis is difficult, and they are often inaccessible to surgical treatment.

The external aneurisms are situate at the exterior of the head, neck, and limbs, and are distinctly pulsatory.

Aneurisms, especially the internal, may be combated by a debilitating treatment, on the plan of Valsalva, which consists in repeated blood-letting, with food enough merely to support life. In external aneurism, the artery can be obliterated. This is usually done by applying a ligature above the aneurismal tumour.

ANEURISM, DISSECTING, is one in which, owing to rupture of the inner and middle coats of an artery, the blood makes itself a channel between these coats and the outer coat.

In many cases, the lesion appears to consist in a separation of the laminae of the middle coat, between which the blood forms itself a channel.

ANEURISMS OF THE HEART, Cardion'chi, Cardierys'ma, (F.) Anérysnes du cœur, have been divided into active and passive. The former can scarcely be esteemed aneurisms, as they most commonly consist of increased thickness of the parietes of the heart, which diminishes its cavity instead of increasing it. The term Hypertrophy of the heart better indicates their character. Passive aneurism, Cardiac'tasis, on the contrary, is attended with extenuation of the parietes of the organ, and enlargement of the cavities. The physical signs of dilatation of the heart are the following:—The action of the heart is not visible, and no impulse is conveyed to the hand. On percussion, there is a loss of resonance over a larger surface than usual, but the dulness is much less intense than that which accompanies hypertrophy. On auscultation, the action of the heart is only slightly felt, and communicates at once the impression of its diminished power. The impulse is feebler than usual. Both sounds are widely transmitted over the thorax, and are not much fainter at a distance from their point of origin.

Partial or true aneurism of the Heart—Cardiect'asis partial'is, Aneurys'ma consecutivum cordis—is sometimes seen; rarely, however.

The name Aneurism of the Valves of the Heart has been given to pouch-like projections of the valves into the auricles.

It is an affection of great danger, and is often connected with ossification, or other morbid condition of the heart. It appears to be neuropathic, and has been termed Neuralgia of the Heart. Some, however, employ this last term for an acutely painful intermittent affection of the heart, which seems to differ from angina pectoris in regard to the small number of parts which are drawn into morbid consent with the affected cardiac nerves, than in regard either to its nature or appropriate treatment. The most powerful stimulating and narcotic antispasmodics are required during the paroxysm.

ANGLE, Angulus, from αγκυλος, 'a hook.' The space between two lines which meet in a point.

ANGLE, Facial, pointed out by Camper, is formed by the union of two lines, one of which is drawn from the most prominent part of the forehead to the alveolar edge of the upper jaw, opposite the incisor teeth—the facial line—and the other from the meatus auditorius externus to the same point of the jaw. According to the size of the angle it has been attempted to appreciate the respective proportions of the cranium and face, and, to a certain extent, the degree of intelligence of individuals and of animals. In the white varieties of the species, this angle is generally 80°; in the negro not more than 70°, and sometimes only 65°. As we descend the scale of animals, the angle becomes less and less; until, in fishes, it nearly or entirely disappears. Animals which have the snout long, and facial angle small, such as the snipe, crane, stork, &c., are proverbially foolish, at least they are so esteemed; whilst intelligence is ascribed to those in which the angle is more largely developed, as the elephant and the owl. In these last animals, however, the large facial angle is caused by the size of the frontal sinuses;—so that this mode of appreciating the size of the brain is very inexact, and cannot be depended upon.

The following is a table of the angle in man and certain animals:

Facial Angles.

Man.....	from 68° to 88° and more.
Sapajou.....	65
Orang-Utang.....	56 to 58
Guenon.....	57
Mandrill.....	30 to 42
Coati.....	28
Pole-Cat.....	31
Pug-Dog.....	35
Mastiff.....	41

Horse.....	23

ANGLE, OCCIPITAL, OF DAUBENTON, is formed by a line drawn from the posterior margin of the foramen magnum to the inferior margin of the orbit, and another drawn from the top of the head to the space between the occipital condyles. In man, these condyles, as well as the foramen magnum, are so situate, that a line drawn perpendicular to them would be a continuation of the spine; but in animals they are placed more or less obliquely; and the perpendicular is necessarily thrown farther forward, and the angle rendered more acute.

ANGLE, OPTIC, (F.) Angle optique, is the angle formed by two lines, which shave the extremities of an object, and meet at the centre of the pupil.

A feeling of strangulation, with dread of suffocation. It is common in hysterical females, and is accompanied with a sensation as if a ball arose from the abdomen to the throat.

AN'IMIST, from anima, 'the soul.' One who, following the example of Stahl, refers all the phenomena of the animal economy to the soul, An'imism.

The soul, according to Stahl, is the immediate and intelligent agent of every movement, and of every material change in the body. Stahl therefore concluded, that disease is nothing more than a disturbance or disorder in the government of the economy, or an effort by which the soul, attentive to every morbid cause, endeavours to expel whatever may be deranging the habitual order of health. See Stahlianism.

ANTHRAKOK'ALI, Lithanthrakok'ali, from ανθραξ, ανθρακος, 'coal,' and καλι, 'potassa.' An article introduced as a remedy in cutaneous diseases. It is formed by dissolving carbonate of potassa in 10 or 12 parts of boiling water, and adding as much slacked lime as will separate the potassa. The filtered liquor is placed on the fire in an iron vessel, and suffered to evaporate, until neither froth nor effervescence occurs, and the liquid presents a smooth surface like oil. To this, levigated coal is added in the proportion of 160 grammes to 192 grammes of potassa. The mixture is stirred, and removed from the fire, and the stirring is continued, until a black homogeneous powder results. A sulphuretted anthrakokali is made by mixing accurately 16 grammes of sulphur with the coal, and dissolving the mixture in the potassa, as directed above. The dose of the simple and sulphuretted preparations is about two grains three times a day.

It has been thought by some to be induced altogether by contact with the matter of the carbuncle of animals, or of the exuviae of the bodies of such as had died of the disease, but it is now known to arise primarily in the human subject. This form of carbuncle has received different names, many of them from the places where it has prevailed:—Carbunculus contagiosus seu Gallicus seu Hungaricus seu Polonicus seu Septentrionalis, Morbis pustulosus Fin'nicus, Pustula gangranosa seu Liv'ida Esthoniae, Pemphigus Hungaricus, Puce de Bourgogne.

It is closed up, however, by the tela choroidea, and also by the fornia, which is intimately connected with this. The foramen is situate between the commissura mollis of the optic thalami and the pineal gland.

AOR'TA, Arte'ria magna seu crassa seu max'ima, Hæmal Axis, of Owen, (F.) Aorte. This name was given by Aristotle to the chief artery of the body. It may have been derived from αορτομαι, 'I am suspended,' as it seems to be suspended from the heart; or from αηρ, 'air,' and τηρω, 'I keep,' because it was supposed to contain air. It is probable that Hippocrates meant by αορτα the bronchia and their ramifications. The aorta is the common trunk of the arteries of the body. It arises from the left ventricle of the heart, about opposite to the fifth dorsal vertebra, passes upwards (ascending Aorta), forms the great arch of the Aorta, and descends along the left of the spine (descending Aorta), until it reaches the middle of the fourth or fifth lumbar vertebra, where it bifurcates, to give origin to the common iliaes. The aorta is sometimes divided into the AP'OPLEXY, Apoplexia, (Sc.) Poplesy, from ἀποπληταιν, 'to strike with violence.' At the present day, the term apoplexy is employed by many writers to signify interstitial hemorrhage, (F.) Hémorrhagie interstitielle, or every effusion of blood, which occurs suddenly into the substance of an organ or tissue. Hence, we speak of cerebral apoplexy, pulmonary apoplexy, &c. &c. Formerly it was always—and still is by many—used in a restricted sense, to signify, in other words, the train of phenomena, which characterize cerebral apoplexy. This disease, Hæmorhagia Cerebri, Aphro'nia, Carus Apoplexia, Coma Apoplexia, Apoplexia cerebri sanguinea seu cerebralis, Encephalorrhagia, Sanguinis ictus, Hæmatencephalum, Pulpezia, Sideratio, Apilepsia, Morbus attonitus, Gutta, Theophlegia, Theoplexia, (F.) Apoplexie, A. cérébrale, Hématoencephalic, Coup de sang, is characterized by diminution, or loss of sensation and mental manifestation; by the cessation, more or less complete, of motion; and by a comatose state,—circulation and respiration continuing. It generally consists in pressure upon the brain; either from turgescence of vessels, or from extravasation of blood: hence the terms Hæmencephalus, Hémorrhagie cérébrale, and Hématoencephalorrhagie, applied to it by some. The general prognosis is unfavourable; especially when it occurs after the age of 35. When Apoplexy is accompanied with a hard, full pulse, and flushed countenance, it is called Apoplexia sanguinea, Cutaph'ora Coma; when with a feeble pulse and pale countenance, and evidences of serous effusion, Apoplexia serosa, A. pituitosa, Serosa Apoplexy, Cutaph'ora hydrocephalica, Encephaloch'ysis scni'lis, Hydrocephalus acutus scium, Hydroencephalorrhée, (Piorry), Hydropisie cérébrale suraiguë, Hydrorrhagie.

In Nervous Apoplexy, Apoplexia nervosa seu spasmodica, A. simplex, Simple apoplexy, no lesion whatever may be perceptible on dissection; although the patient may have died under all the phenomena that are characteristic of apoplexy.

In Surgery, it means the methodical arrangement of all the instruments and objects necessary for an operation or dressing. By extension, the French give the name Appareil, Capsa chirur'gica, to the case or drawers in which the apparatus is arranged.

Apparatus has likewise been applied to the different modes of operating for the stone. See Lithotomy.

In Physiology, Apparatus, (F.) Appareil, is applied to a collection of organs, all of which work towards the same end. A system of organs comprehends all those formed of a similar texture. An apparatus often comprehends organs of very different nature. In the former, there is analogy of structure; in the latter, analogy of function.

The first, as a whole, form the organs of the mental faculties: the latter are commissures, which unite parts of the organ that are double and in pairs.

In the latter case it is called venereal appetite, (F.) Appetit vénérien: in the former, simply appetite, (F.) Appetit or Appetition. If the desire for food, occasioned by a real want, be carried to a certain extent, it is called hunger, when solid food is concerned; thirst, when liquid. Appetite and hunger ought not, however, to be employed synonymously: they are different degrees of the same want. Hunger is an imperious desire: it cannot be provoked, like the appetite. It is always allayed by eating: but not so the appetite; for, at times, it may be excited in this manner. They are very generally, however, used synonymously.

Before the year of the Hegira, they had schools of medicine; but these were most flourishing during the 10th, 11th, and 12th centuries. The chief additions made by them to medical science were in the departments of pharmacy and in the description of diseases. Their principal writers were Avicenna, Serapion, Avenzoar, Rhazes, Albucasis, &c. The disciples of the Arab school were called Arabists.

Celsus and Galen called thus the membrane of the vitreous humour,—the tunica hyaloidea. The moderns use it now for one of the membranes of the brain, situate between the dura mater and pia mater. It is a serous membrane, and composed of two layers; the external being confounded, in the greater part of its extent, with the dura mater, and, like it, lining the interior of the cranium and spinal canal; the other being extended over the brain, from which it is separated by the pia mater, without passing into the sinuosities between the convolutions, and penetrating into the interior of the brain by an opening at its posterior part under the corpus callosum. It forms a part of the investing sheath of the nerves, as they pass from the encephalic cavities. Besides this chief archæus, whose seat Van Helmont placed in the upper orifice of the stomach, he admitted several of a subordinate character, which had to execute its orders; one, for instance, in each organ, to preside over its functions; each of them being subject to anger, caprice, terror, and every human feeling.

AREOLA. A diminutive of Area, (F.) Aire. Anatomists understand by Areolæ the interstices between the fibres composing organs, or those existing between laminae, or between vessels which interlace with each other.

Areola is also applied to the coloured circle Halo, Halos, which surrounds the nipple, Areola papilla'ris, and which becomes much darker during pregnancy; as well as to the circle surrounding certain vesicles, pustules, &c., as the pustules of the small-pox, the vaccine vesicle, &c. Chaussier, in such cases, recommends the word Aur'ola, (F.) Aur'ole.

AREOLA PAPILLARIS, see Areola—a. Tubercles of the, see Mamma.

AREOLAR, Areola'ris. Appertaining to an areola.

AREOLAR EXHALATIONS are those recementitious secretions which are effected within the organs of sense, or in parenchymatous structures—as the aqueous, crystalline, and vitreous humours, &c.

AREOLAR TISSUE, Cellular Tissue.

AREOMETER, Aræom'eter, Gravim'eter, Alcoëlom'eter, Alcoëm'eter, Aërostat'ic Balance, from αραιος, 'light,' and μετρον, 'measure;' i. e. 'measure of lightness.' An instrument so called because first employed to take the specific gravity of fluids lighter than water. The Areometer of Baumé, which is the most used in Pharmacy, particularly in France, consists of a tube of glass, largely expanded towards its inferior extremity, and terminating below by a small ball, containing mercury or lead, which serves it as a balance, so that it may remain upright in the fluid. This tube is furnished with a graduated scale. If the fluid into which the Areometer is plunged be heavier than water, the instrument rises; if lighter, it sinks. There are various Areometers, as those of the Dutch, of Fahrenheit, Nicholson, &c. The Areometer is also called Hydrom'eter, (F.) Aréomètre, Pèse-liqueur.

There are some hydrometers which have a general application for determining the specific gravities of liquids—as Fahrenheit's, Nicholson's, Guyton de Morveau's, and the common glass hydrometers, including Baumé's, Cartier's, Twaddle's, Zanetti's, and the specific gravity beads; others intended for special application—as for estimating the comparative strength of spirits; the comparative densities of syrups, oils, &c.—as Gay Lussac's, Sikes's, and Dicat's hydrometers, and the saccharometer, urinometer, and elæometer.

ARGENTI NITRAS, Argentum Nitra'tum seu Nitricum, Sal argen'ti, (F.) Nitrate ou Azotate d'Argent, Nitrate of Silver. This preparation is sometimes kept in crystals, the Nitras Argenti in crystallos concre'tus, Nitrate d'Argent cristallise of the Codex of Paris, Luna potab'ilis, Crystalli Lunæ, Argentum nitricum crystallisatum, Nitras argenti cristallinus, Nitrum luna'rè, Hydragogum BOY'LEI. Generally, however, it is in the fused state: and it is this which is admitted into most Pharmacopœias, and which, besides the name Nitras Argenti, is called Nitras argen'ti fusus seu fustum, Caus'ticum luna'rè, Lapis infernalis, Argentum nitricum fustum, and lunar caustic, (F.) Nitrate d'argent fondu, Pierre infernale.

In the Pharmacopœia of the United States, it is directed to be prepared as follows:—Take of silver, in small pieces, ℥j; nitric acid, fʒvij, distilled water, fʒij. Mix the acid with the water, and dissolve the silver in the mixture in a sand bath; then crystallize, or gradually increase the heat, so that the resulting salt may be dried. Melt this in a crucible over a gentle fire, and continue the heat until ebullition ceases; then immediately pour it into suitable moulds.

The virtues of nitrate of silver are tonic, and escharotic. It is given in chorea, epilepsy, &c.: locally, it is used in various cases as an escharotic. Dose, gr. 1-8 to gr. 1-4 in pill, three times a day.

When silver is combined with iodine, it is said to have the same effect as the nitrate, and not to produce the slate colour of the surface, which is apt to follow the protracted use of the latter.

ARGENTI OXIDUM, see Argentum.

ARGENTILLA VULGARIS, Potentilla anserina.

AR'GENTINE, Argento'sus, same etymon as the next. Pertaining to silver; as an 'argentine solution,' or solution of a salt of silver.

ARGENTUM, Ar'gyrus, from argyros, 'white,' Silver, Luna, Dia'na, (F.) Argent. A solid metal of a shining white appearance; insipid; inodorous; highly sonorous; malleable and ductile; somewhat hard; crystallizable in triangular pyramids; fusible a little above a red heat, and volatizable; s. g. 10.4. Not used in medicine, unless in some places for silvering pills. SILVER LEAF, Argentum foliatum, is the state in which it is used for this purpose.

ARGENTUM DIVISUM, metallic silver, in very fine powder, has been recommended internally in syphilis.

THE CHLORIDE (Argen'ti chlo'ridum, Argentum muriat'icum seu chlora'tum seu sali'tum, Chlorure'tum Argen'ti, Chlor'uret or Mu'riate of Silver, (F.) Chlorure d'Argent); the CYANURET; the IODIDE (Argen'ti Io'didum, Argentum Ioda'tum, Iodure'tum Argen'ti, Iod'uret of Silver, (F.) Iodure d'Argent); the OXIDE (Argen'ti ox'idum, Argentum oxyda'tum, (F.) Oxide d'Argent), and the CHLORIDE OF AMMONIA and SILVER (Argen'ti et Ammo'niæ chlo'ridum, Argentum muriat'icum ammonia'tum, Chlorure'tum Argen'ti et Ammo'niæ, Chlor'uret of Silver and Ammonia, Ammonio-chloride of Silver, (F.) Chlorure d'Argent et d'Ammoniaque), have been used in syphilis. At first, these different preparations were administered intraleptically on the gums; the chloride, the cyanide and the iodide in the dose of 1-12th of a grain; the chloride of silver and ammonia in the dose of 1-14th of a grain, and the oxide of silver and divided silver in the dose of 1-8th and 1-4th of a grain. M. Serre, of Montpellier, who made many trials with them, soon found that these doses were too small; he therefore raised that of the chloride to 1-10th, and of the iodide to 1-8th of a grain, without any inconvenience resulting. The dose of the other preparations was likewise increased in a similar ratio. M. Serre extols the preparations of silver—used internally as well as iatroleptically—as antisypilitic, but they are not to be depended upon.

The Cyanuret or Cyanide of Silver, Argen'ti Cyanure'tum seu Cyan'idum, Argentum cyanogenatum, (F.) Cyanure d'Argent, is thus directed to be prepared in the Ph. U. S. (1842) Argent. Nit. ʒxv, Acid Hydrocyan., Aq. destillat. zā Oj. Having dissolved the nitrate of silver in the water, add the hydrocyanic acid, and mix them. Wash the precipitate with distilled water and dry it. In the last edition of the Pharmacopœia, (1851), it is directed to be prepared as follows:—Nitrate of Silver, dissolved in distilled water, is put into a tubulated glass receiver; Ferrocyanuret of Potassium, dissolved in distilled water, is put into a tubulated retort, previously adapted to the receiver. Dilute Sulphuric Acid is added to the solution in the retort; and, by means of a sand-bath and a moderate heat, distillation is carried on until the liquid that passes over no longer produces a precipitate in the receiver. The precipitate is then washed with distilled water, and dried.

The Oxide of Silver, Argen'ti Ox'idum, has been introduced into the last edition of the Ph. U. S. (1851). It is made by precipitating a solution of the Nitrate of Silver by solution of Potassa, drying the precipitate.

Eight ounces of distilled water are poured on, and, after trituration for a few moments, the whole is transferred to a flask; half a drachm of hydriodic acid, prepared by the acidification of two grains of iodine, is added, and the mixture is boiled for a few moments. When the solution is cold, make the mixture up to $\mathfrak{f}\mathfrak{viij}$ with distilled water. This is called by Mr. Donovan, the proposer, Liquor Arsenici et Hydrargyri Iodidi, each drachm of which, by measure, consists of water, \mathfrak{ss} ; arsenious acid, gr. 1-8th; peroxide of mercury, gr. 1-4th; iodine, converted into hydriodic acid, gr. 3-4ths. In the last edition of the Ph. U. S. it is directed to be made of Arsenici Iodidum and Hydrargyri Iodidum rubrum, each gr. xxxv; and Aqua destillata, Oss; dissolving by rubbing, heating to the boiling point, and filtering.

ARTERIOT'OMY, Arterioto'm'ia, from αρτηρια, 'an artery,' and τεμνω, 'I cut.' This word has been used for the dissection of arteries. Most commonly, however, it means a surgical operation, which consists in opening an artery, to draw blood from it. Arteriotomy is chiefly used in inflammatory affections of the head, when the blood is generally obtained from the temporal artery. See Bloodletting.

ARTERITIS, Arteri'itis, Inflammatio Arteriarum, (F.) Artérite, Inflammation des artères; from αρτηρια, 'an artery,' and itis, a termination denoting inflammation. Inflammation of an artery. Inflammation of the inner coat of an artery is termed Endo-arteri'tis, or Endoarteri'tis; of the outer, Exo-arteri'tis or Exarteri'tis.

ARTERY, Arter'ia, (F.) Artère, from anp, 'air,' and τηρειν, 'to preserve,' quasi, 'receptacle of air,' because the ancients believed that it contained air. They, at first, gave the name Artery to the trachea, αρτηρια τραχεια, because it is filled with air; and afterwards they used the same term for the arteries, properly so called, probably because they commonly found them empty in the dead body. We find, also, φλεβες to designate the arteries, called by the Latins Venæ mican'tes pulsat'iles. Arteries, with the moderns, signify the order of vessels, which arise from the two ventricles of the heart, and have valves only at their origin. They are cylindrical, firm, and elastic canals; of a yellowish white colour; little dilatable; easily lacerable; and formed, 1. Of an external, laminated, or areolar membrane, Tu'nica externa seu adventit'ia seu cellula'ris, Vagina cellula'ris, of a dense and close character. 2. Of a middle coat, Tu'nica me'dia seu elast'ica, composed of fibres, which do not, however, contract on the application of the galvanic stimulus, formed chiefly of elastic tissue, and also of smooth muscular fibres, and eminently elastic; and, 3. Of an inner coat, Tu'nica in'tima seu glabra, which is thin, diaphanous, reddish, and polished.

The use of the arteries is to carry the blood from the heart to the various parts of the system. It will be obvious, however, that they cannot all convey arterial blood. The pulmonary artery, for example, is destined to convey the venous blood to the lungs, there to be converted into arterial; whilst the pulmonary veins convey arterial blood back to the heart.

TABLE OF THE PRINCIPAL ARTERIES OF THE BODY.

All the arteries take their rise from the Pulmonary Artery, or the Aorta; and the names generally indicate the parts to which they are distributed.

I. ARTERIA PULMONALIS.

The Pulmonary Artery arises from the right ventricle, and soon divides into a right and left branch, one of which is distributed to each lung.

II. ARTERIA AORTA.

The Aorta arises from the left ventricle. It is the common trunk of the arteries of the body, and may be divided into five portions.

a. Arteries furnished by the Aorta at its origin.

1. A. Cardiaca or coronaria anterior.
2. A. Cardiaca or coronaria posterior.

b. Arteries furnished by the Aorta at its arch.

The arch of the Aorta gives off, to the left, two considerable trunks—the Arteria carotidea primitiva, and A. subclavia; and, to the right, a single trunk, which is larger—the A. innominata, or Brachio-cephalica, which divides into the primitiva carotid and subclavian.

A. ARTERIA CAROTIDEA PRIMITIVA.

Divides into A. Carotidea externa, and A. Carotidea interna.

ARTICULAR ARTERIES OF THE ARM, Circumflex arteries of the arm.

ARTICULAR ARTERIES OF THE KNEE arise from the popliteal artery, and surround the tibio-femoral articulation. Although of a small size, they are important, as they furnish blood to the lower extremity after the operation for popliteal aneurism. They are distinguished into superior and inferior. The superior articular arteries, popliteal articular arteries, are commonly three in number; one of which is internal, another external, and another middle, the azygous articular. The first, Ramus anastomoticus magnus, anastomoses by one branch with the external circumflex, and by another with the external superior articular. The second anastomoses with the external circumflex, the superior internal articular, and the inferior external articular; and the third is distributed within the joint. The inferior articular arteries are two in number: an internal and external. The former anastomoses with the internal superior articular and the external inferior articular. The latter anastomoses with the recurrent branch of the anterior tibial, and the external superior articular. To each articular artery there is an articular nerve.

ARTICULAR FACETTES' are the contiguous surfaces, by means of which the bones are articulated.

By some of the French surgeons and anatomists, article is restricted more particularly to a movable articulation. Same etymon. The union of bones with each other, as well as the kind of union.

Most generally, it is owing to obstructed circulation in some of the viscera, or to excitement of the vessels of the abdominal organs. The treatment is essentially the same as that of other dropsies. Paracentesis, when had recourse to, can only be regarded as a palliative.

generally means suspended animation, produced by the nonconversion of the venous blood of the lungs into arterial,—Απναι'α, Απνευσ'τια, Απναι'ασφυξ'ια, Ανηζωματο'σια, Εκ'ελυσις pneumo-cardi'aca, Ανοζωμ'ια, Ηypoζωμ'ια,—Πορρυ. Owing to the supply of air being cut off, the unchanged venous blood of the pulmonary artery passes into the minute radicles of the pulmonary veins, but their peculiar excitability requiring arterial blood to excite them, stagnation takes place in the pulmonary radicles, and death occurs chiefly from this cause,—not owing to venous blood being distributed through the system, and 'poisoning' it, as was the idea of Bichat. Carus asphyx'ια, Mors appa'rens, Mors putati'va, Pseudothan'atos, Apparent death, (F.) Mort apparente, is characterized by suspension of respiration, of the cerebral functions, &c. Several varieties of Asphyxia have been designated.

2. ASPHYX'IA BY NOXIOUS INHALA'TION, or inhalation of gases, some of which cause death by producing a spasmodic closure of the glottis; others by the want of oxygen; and others are positively deleterious or poisonous.

3. ASPHYX'IA BY STRANGULA'TION, or Suffoca'tion; produced by mechanical impediment to respiration, as in hanging.

4. ASPHYX'IA BY SUBMER'SION, A. by drown'ing, A. Immerso'rum, Angiairhydrie (Piorry), as occurs in the drowned, who perish in consequence of the medium in which they are plunged, being unfit for respiration. See Submersion.

Difficulty of breathing, recurring at intervals, accompanied with a wheezing sound and sense of constriction in the chest; cough and expectoration.

Asthma is a chronic disease, and not curable with facility. Excitant and narcotic antispasmodics are required.

There are no pathognomonic physical signs of asthma. In some cases, the respiration is universally puerile during the attack. In the spasmodic form, the respiratory murmur is very feeble or absent during the fit; and in all forms percussion elicits a clear pulmonary sound. The disease generally consists in some source of irritation, and occasionally, perhaps, in paralysis of the pneumogastric nerves, Bronchoparalysis, Paralysis nervi vagi in parte thorac'ica, more frequently of the former—all the phenomena indicating constriction of the smaller bronchial ramifications. The treatment is one that relieves spasmodic action—narcotics, counter-irritants, change of air, &c.

A disease of infants, characterized by suspension of respiration at intervals; great difficulty of breathing, especially on waking, swallowing, or crying; ending often in a fit of suffocation, with convulsions. The pathology of the disease has been supposed to consist in an enlargement of the thymus gland, or of the glands of the neck pressing on the pneumogastric nerves [?]. The ear, by auscultation, at a distance from the chest, detects an incomplete, acute, hissing inspiration, or rather cry; whilst the expiration and voice are croupal, both at the accession and termination of the paroxysm. The heart's action has been observed to be distinct and feeble.

These symptoms are often accompanied by rigidity of the fingers and toes; the thumb being frequently drawn forcibly into the palm of the clenched hand, whence the name Carpo-pedal spasm, applied, at times, to the disease.

The sensation arising from an impression made on the auditory nerves by the vibrations of the air, produced by a sonorous body. The physiology of Audition is obscure. It probably takes place:—

1. By the vibrations being communicated from the membrana tympani along the chain of small bones to the membrane of the foramen ovale. 2. By means of the air in the cavity of the tympanum, the membrane of the foramen rotundum is agitated. 3. The transmission may be made by means of the bony parietes. In these three ways the vibrations produced by a sonorous body may reach the auditory nerve. Audition may be active or passive: hence the difference between listening and simply hearing.

AUDITORY, Audit'orius, Audit'ivus, Acu'sticus, (F.) Auditif. That which relates to audition.

The Auditory Veins empty into the internal and external jugulars.

AUDITORY CANAL, EXTERNAL, Meatus audit'orius exter'nus, Alvear'ium, Scapha, Scaphus, (F.) Conduit auditif externe, Conduit auriculaire, commences at the bottom of the concha, at the Foramen auditivum exter'num, passes inwards, forwards, and a little downwards, and terminates at the membrana tympani. It is partly cartilaginous, partly osseous, and partly fibrous.

AUDITORY CANAL, INTERNAL, Meatus audit'orius inter'nus, Porus seu Sinus acu'sticus, Cyar, (F.) Conduit auditif interne, C. labyrinthique, is situate on the posterior surface of the pars petrosa of the temporal bone. From the Foramen auditivum inter'num, where it commences, it passes forwards and outwards, and terminates by a kind of cul-de-sac, macula cribrosa, perforated by many holes, one of which is the orifice of the Aquæductus Fallopii; and the others communicate with the labyrinth.

AUDITORY NERVE, Nervus audit'orius seu acus'ticus, Nerf labyrinthique—(Ch.), is the Portio Mollis of the seventh pair. It arises from the corpus testiforme, from the floor of the fourth ventricle, and by means of white striæ from the sides of the calamus scriptorius. As it leaves the encephalon, it forms a flattened cord, and proceeds with the facial nerve through the foramen auditivum internum, and as far as the bottom of the meatus, where it separates from the facial, and divides into two branches, one going to the cochlea, the cochlear; the other to the vestibule and semi-circular canals, the vestibular.

In Pathology, Aura means the sensation of a light vapour, which, in some diseases, appears to set out from the trunk or limbs; and to rise towards the head. This feeling has been found to precede attacks of epilepsy and hysteria, and hence it has been called Aura Epilep'tica, and A. hysterica.

AURICLES OF THE HEART, Auric'ulae, A'tria, Cavita'tes innomina'tæ, (F.) Oreillettes, are two cavities, one right, the other left, each communicating with the ventricle of its side. These two cavities receive the blood from every part of the body. Into the right auricle, the two venæ cavæ and coronary vein open: into the left, the four pulmonary veins. They arise from the temporal artery, and are distributed to the meatus auditorius externus, and to the pavilion of the ear. The posterior auricular is given off by the external carotid, from which it separates in the substance of the parotid gland. When it reaches the inferior part of the pavilion of the ear it bifurcates; one of its branches being distributed to the inner surface of the pavilion, the other passing over the mastoid process, and being distributed to the temporal and posterior auris muscles, &c. Before its bifurcation it gives off the stylo-mastoid artery. The Anterior and Posterior Auricular Veins open into the temporal and external jugular.

AURICULAR FINGER, (F.) Doigt auriculaire, is the little finger, so called because, owing to its size, it can be more readily introduced into the meatus auditorius.

AURICULAR NERVES are several. 1. The auricular branch, Zygomato-auricular, is one of the ascending branches of the cervical plexus. It ramifies and spreads over the two surfaces of the pavilion. 2. The auricular or superficial temporal, Temporal-cutaneous—(Ch.), is given off from the inferior maxillary. It ascends between the condyle of the jaw and the meatus auditorius externus, sends numerous filaments to the meatus and pavilion, and divides into two twigs, which accompany the branches of the temporal artery, and are distributed to the integuments of the head. There is also a posterior auricular furnished by the facial.

This may be done by the aid of an instrument called a stethoscope, one extremity of which is applied to the ear, the other to the chest of the patient. This mode of examination is called Mediate Auscultation, (F.) Auscultation médiate,—the application of the ear to the chest being immediate auscultation.

BALSAM, Bal'samum, Bal'samus, Bol'son, Bell'son, (F.) Baume. This name is given to natural vegetable substances, concrete or liquid, but very odorous, bitter, and piquant: composed of resin, benzoic acid, and sometimes of an essential oil—which allow benzoic acid to be disengaged by the action of heat; readily dissolved in volatile oil, alcohol, and ether; and, when treated with alkalis, afford a soluble benzoate, and throw down resin. We know of only five balsams—those of Peru, and Tolu, Benzoin, solid Styrax or Storax, and liquid Styrax. (See those different words.) There are, however, many pharmaceutical preparations and resinous substances, possessed of a balsamic smell, to which the name balsam has been given; but they differ essentially in composition and properties: hence the distinction of balsams into natural and artificial. BANDAGE, Desma, Syndes'mus, Hypodes'mis, Hypodesma, Hypodes'mus, (the last three signify properly an under bandage.) A binder, from Sax. bindan, 'to bind.' This word, with the French, is generally used to express the methodical application of rollers, compresses, &c., Bandaging, Syn'desis, to fix an apparatus upon any part,—corresponding to the words deligatio, fasciatio, fasciarum applicatio, epid'esis. With us the noun is usually applied to the result of the application, or to the bandage itself:—a sense in which the French employ the word Bande. Bandages are simple or compound. The simple bandage is equal, if the turns are applied circularly above each other; unequal, if the turns are not accurately applied upon each other. If each turn of the bandage be only covered one-third, it forms the doloire of the French; if the edges touch only slightly, it is the moussé; if the turns are very oblique and separated, it is the spiral or creeping, (F.) rampant; if folded upon each other, it is termed the reversed, (F.) renversé. By uniting various kinds of bandaging, we have the compound; and these compound bandages have received various names expressive of their figure, or of the parts to which they are applied, as capistrum, spica, &c. Bandages are divided, also, as regards their uses, into uniting, dividing, retaining, expelling, compressing, &c.

BANDAGE OR ROLLER, Fas'cia, Tæ'nia, Epides'mos, Vin'culum, the Bande of the French. It may be made of linen, flannel, or other stuff capable of offering a certain resistance. The two extremities of a bandage are called tails, (F.) chefs, and the rolled part is termed its head, (F.) globe. If rolled at both extremities, it is called a double-headed roller or bandage, (F.) Bande à deux globes.

BANDAGE À BANDELETTES SÉPARÉES, Bandage of separate strips.

BANDAGE, BODY, Manti'le, (F.) Bandage de Corps, is used for fixing dressings, &c., to the trunk. It is formed of a towel, napkin, or some large compress, folded three or four times; the extremities of which are fastened by pins. This is again fixed by means of the scapulary bandage, which is nothing more than an ordinary bandage, stitched to the anterior and middle part of the napkin, passing over the clavicles and behind the head, to be attached to the back part of the napkin.

BANDAGE, COMPOUND, see Bandage.

BANDAGE, COMPRESSING, OR ROLLER, Fascia compressiva seu convoluta, (F.) Bandage compressive ou roulé, is the simple roller with one head; and is employed in cases of ulcers, varices, &c., of the limbs. Whenever this roller is applied to the lower part of the limbs, it is carried upwards by the doloire and reversed methods above described.

BANDAGE, COMPRESSIVE, see Bandage, compressing—b. de Corps, see Bandage—b. Dividing, see Bandage—b. Divisif, Dividing bandage—b. à dix-huit Chefs, Bandage, eighteen-tailed—b. en Doloire, Doloire—b. Double-headed, see Bandage.

BANDAGE, EIGHTEEN-TAILED, Fas'cia octod'ecim capit'ibus, (F.) Bandage à dix-huit chefs. This bandage is made of a longitudinal portion of a common roller; and with a sufficient number of transverse pieces or tails, to cover as much of the part as is requisite. It is a very useful bandage, inasmuch as it can be undone without disturbing the part.

To the lower extremity of this, one or two bandages are attached, which pass under the thigh, and are fixed to the posterior part of the cincture. This bandage may be either simple or double.

Other bandages will be found described under their various names.

This is formed of linen strips, each capable of surrounding once and a half the part to which they have to be applied, and placed upon each other, so as to cover successively one-third of their width. It is used chiefly for fractures, requiring frequent dressing.

Syst.* Diocia Pentandria. The leaves and flowers of Cannabis are narcotic and astringent. They are chewed and smoked. The seeds, mixed with opium, arca, and sugar, produce a kind of intoxication, and are used for this purpose by the people of India. An alcoholic extract of the plant, Churrus—Extractum Can'nabis (Ph. U. S.)—has been used in India, and since then in Europe and in this country, as a narcotic and anti-convulsive, in the dose of from half a grain to ten or more. It ought to be entirely free from fat or grease.—Dr. E. J. Seymour.

Essence of beef—as it has been called—may be made by putting a pound of good beef, freed from fat, and cut into small pieces, into a porter-bottle, corking lightly. The bottle must be put into boiling water, and kept there until the water has been boiling at least half an hour. As the boiling goes on, the cork may be inserted a little more tightly, to retain the contents of the bottle. The juices of the beef are thus separated, and constitute the 'essence,' which may be seasoned to the taste. It contains much nutriment.

BLOOD, Anglo-Saxon, bloð, from bleðan, 'to bleed.' Sanguis, Cruor, Lapis animalis, Hæma, 'αἷμα, (Old Eng.) Blede, (F.) Sang. An animal fluid formed chiefly from the chyle; acquiring important properties during respiration; entering every organ through the circulation; distributing the nutritive principles to every texture, and the source of every secretion. The blood is white in the molluscous and inferior animals, which have been, hence, called white-blooded, to distinguish them from the red-blooded, which class includes the mammalia, birds, reptiles, and fishes. Human blood is composed of water, albumen, fibrin, an animal colouring substance, a little fatty matter—hæmatocleum—and different salts; as chlorides of potassium and sodium, phosphate of lime, subcarbonate of soda, lime, magnesia, oxide of iron, and lactate of soda, united with an animal matter. Arterial blood is of a florid red colour, strong smell; s. g. 1.049. Venous blood is of a brownish red; s. g. 1.051. The difference in colour has given occasion to the first being called red blood; the latter, black. The former, which is distributed from the heart, is nearly the same through its whole extent: the latter is the remains of the arterial blood after the different elements have been taken from it in nutrition, and probably differs in composition. It likewise contains different substances absorbed. Venous blood, taken from a vessel and left to itself, becomes solid, and separates into two distinct parts,—the serum or watery supernatant fluid; and the cruor, coagulum, crassamentum, hepar seu placenta sanguinis, placenta cruoris, insula, thrombus, or clot. The serum is chiefly water, holding albumen in solution and the salts of the blood. The clot contains the fibrin, colouring matter—hæmatosin, a little serum, and a small quantity of salts. M. Le Canu found the blood to be composed—in 1000 parts—of water, 785.590; albumen, 69.415; fibrin, 3.565; colouring matter, 119.626; crystallizable fatty matter, 4.300; oily matter, 2.270; extractive matter soluble in alcohol and water, 1.920; albumen combined with soda, 2.010; chlorides of sodium and potassium; alkaline phosphates, sulphates, and subcarbonates, 7.304; subcarbonate of lime and magnesia, phosphate of lime, magnesia and iron, peroxide of iron, 1.414; loss, 2.586. The four principal components of the blood are fibrin, albumen, corpuscles, and saline matter. In the circulating blood they are thus combined—

Fibrin, }
Albumen, } In solution forming Liquor Sanguinis, Salts, }

Red Corpuscles—suspended in the Liquor Sanguinis.

In coagulated blood they are thus combined:

Fibrin, } Forming the crassamentum or Red Corpuscles, } clot.
Albumen, } Remaining in solution, forming Salts, } serum.

The proportion of arterial blood to venous is about 4 to 9.

Much attention has been paid to the varying condition of the blood in disease. The average proportion of each of the organic elements in 1000 parts of healthy blood is as follows, according to Le Canu, and MM. Audral and Gavarret:—fibrin, 3; red corpuscles, 127; solid matter of the serum, 80; water, 790.

Dried human blood was, at one time, considered to be anti-epileptic; that of the goat, dried, Sanguis hirci siccatus, sudorific and antileporetic. The dried blood of the ox—Extractum Sanguinis Bovini—and the dried red corpuscles have been given as anæsthetics, especially where there was a deficiency of red corpuscles.

Bleeding, (F.) Saignée, Emission sanguine. A discharge of a certain quantity of blood produced by art: an operation which consists in making an opening into a vessel to draw or let blood from it. When practised on an artery, it is called Arteriotomy; on a vein, Phlebotomy, Venæsectio, Venesectio; and on the capillary vessels, local or capillary, in contradistinction to the former, which is termed general. Blood-letting is used both during the existence of a disease, as in inflammation, and in the way of prophylaxis. It is employed to fulfil various indications. 1. To diminish the actual mass of blood;—when it is termed, by the French pathologists, Saignée évacuative. In such case, fluids ought not to be allowed too freely afterwards. 2. To diminish the turgescence in any particular organ—(F.) Saignée résolutive, Revulsive blood-letting or bleeding, Venæsectio revulsoria, when performed far from the part affected; and Saignée dérivative, when near. 3. To diminish the consistence of the blood, (F.) Saignée spoliative. The immediate effects of blood-letting are: diminution of the mass of blood and of heat; retardation of the pulse, and sometimes syncope. Blood-letting from the veins—phlebotomy—is practised on the subcutaneous veins of the neck, the face, the fore-arm, and the leg; sometimes on those of the hand or foot. The necessary apparatus consists of a bandage or riband, a compress of rag, and a lancet or fleam.

The veins selected for the operation, are, 1. In the fold of the arm, five;—the cephalic, basilic, the two median, and the anterior cubital. 2. In the hand, the cephalic and salvatella. 3. In the foot, the great and little saphena. 4. In the neck, the external jugular. 5. In the forehead, the frontal. 6. In the mouth, the ranine. The operation of phlebotomy in the limbs is performed by tying a circular bandage round the limb, in order that the subcutaneous veins may become turgid by the course of the blood being obstructed: the bandage not being so tight, however, as to compress the arteries of the limb. A puncture is made into the vein, and the desired quantity allowed to flow. The ligature is now removed, and a compress and retaining bandage applied. Capillary or local blood-letting, arterio-phlebotomy, is practised on the skin or mucuous membranes, by means of leeches, the lancet, or cupping.

Until of late, this office was executed in England by two old women—called 'searchers'; and hence the imperfections of the Bills of Mortality. In plague times, the office was an important one; and, it is stated, that a noted searcher, named Snacks, finding his business increase so much, that he could not transact it alone, offered to any one who would join him in its hazards, half the profits; and they who joined him were said to "go with Snacks." Hence, the saying "to go Snacks," or to divide the spoils.—Wadd.

The bones are the solid and hard parts, which form the basis of the bodies of animals of the superior classes; and the union of which constitutes the skeleton. The human body has, at the adult age, 208 bones, without including the 32 teeth, the ossa Wormiana, and the sesamoid bones. Anatomists divide them, from their shape, into 1. Long bones, which form part of the limbs, and represent columns for supporting the weight of the body, or levers of different kinds for the muscles to act upon. 2. Flat bones, which form the parietes of splanchnic cavities; and, 3. Short bones, met with in parts of the body where solidity and some mobility are necessary. Bones are formed of two different textures; spongy and compact. They afford, on analysis, much phosphate and carbonate of lime, a little phosphate of magnesia, phosphate of ammonia, oxides of iron and manganese, some traces of alumina and silica, gelatin, fat, and water. The uses of the bones are mentioned under each bone. They give shape to the body, contain and defend the viscera, and act as levers to the muscles.

BRONCHI, Bronchia.

BRONCHIA, Bronchia, Bronchi, from βρογχος, 'the throat.' The Latins used the term Bronchus for the whole of the trachea; whilst they called its ramifications Bronchia. Bronchia, Bronchie, and Bronchi, (F.) Bronches, now mean the two tubes, with their ramifications, which arise from the bifurcation of the trachea, and carry air into the lungs—Canal'les pulmo'num, Syrin'ges seu Canal'es aëri'eri.

BRONCHIA, DILATATION OF THE, Dilated Bronchia, Bronche'ctasis, Bronchie'ctasis, Dilatatio bronchio'rum. The physical signs of this condition are the following: Percussion usually clear, but not infrequently less so than natural, although very seldom quite dull. Auscultation detects coarse mucous or gurgling rhonchi, increased by the cough, combined with, or replaced by, bronchial or cavernous respiration, which is often effected as if by a sudden puff or whiff. The resonance of the voice is increased, but it seldom amounts to perfect pectoriloquy. The most common situations for dilated bronchia are the scapular, mammary, or lateral regions. They are almost always confined to one side.

BRONCHIA, OBLITERATION OR COMPRESSION OF THE. The inspiratory murmur on auscultation is weaker or wholly suppressed over a limited portion of the chest; the expiration is generally more distinct and prolonged: all the other conditions are natural.

BRONCHLÆ, see Bronchia.

Their functions are unknown. The bronchial glands may be presumed to be affected by scrofulosis, when, in addition to the existence of tumours in the neck, percussion gives a dull sound under the upper and central part of the sternum, whilst there is no appreciable lesion of the lungs.

BRONCHIAL NERVES, (F.) Nerfs bronchiques, are furnished by the two pulmonary plexuses.

Inflammation of the lining membrane of the bronchial tubes. This is always more or less present in cases of pulmonary catarrh; and is accompanied by cough, mucous expectoration, dyspnoea, and more or less uneasiness in breathing. The acute form is accompanied with all the signs of internal inflammation, and requires the employment of antiphlogistics followed by revulsives. The chronic form, Tussis seni'lis, Catar'rhus seni'lis, Rheuma catarrh'alè, Peripneumo'nia notha, Bronchorrhœ'a acuta, Winter Cough, Chronic Catarrh, may be confounded with phtthisis; from which it must be distinguished mainly by the absence of hectic fever and of the physical signs that are characteristic of the latter, as well as by the nature of the expectoration, which is generally mucous, although at times mucopurulent. When the expectoration is little or none, the bronchitis is said to be dry, dry catarrh, (F.) Catarrhe Sec.

When bronchitis affects the smaller tubes, it is termed capillary bronchitis, bronchitis capilla'ris, broncho'acèe infanti'lis [?], and is often fatal to children. Vesicular bronchitis is the term proposed by M.M. Rilliet and Barthez for the vesicular pneumonia of children.

BRUIT DE DIABLE, Rouflement du Diable, Bruit de soufflé à double courant, 'noise of the diable, or humming-top.' Venous hum. A high degree of Bruit de soufflet, heard on auscultating the arteries or veins—probably the latter—of the neck, in chlorosis. It denotes an impoverished state of the blood.

BRUIT DOUBLE DU CŒUR DU FŒTUS, Bruit du Cœur fœtal—b. d'Expansion pulmonaire, see Murmur, respiratory—b. de Frôlement, see Frôlement—b. de Froissement pulmonaire, see Froissement pulmonaire—b. de Frôlement péricardique, see Frôlement péricardique.

BRUIT DE FROTTEMENT ASCENDANT ET DESCENDANT, 'sound of friction of ascent and descent.' Sounds produced by the rubbing of the lung against the parietes of the chest, as it rises and falls during inspiration and expiration. They are distinctly heard in pleuritis, when the pleura has become roughened by the disease. Friction sounds, Rubbing sounds, To-and-fro sounds are also heard in pericarditis and peritonitis.

BRUIT MUSCULAIRE. The sound accompanying the first sound of the heart, referred by some to muscular contraction. Called, also, Bruit rotatoire, in consequence of its having been thought to resemble the rumbling of distant wheels.

BRUIT MUSICAL, Sifflement modulé.

BRUIT PLACENTAIRE, B. de soufflé placentaire ou utérin, Soufflé utérin ou placentaire, Placental bellows' sound, Utero-placental murmur, Uterine murmur. The bellows' sound heard on auscultating over the site of the placenta in a pregnant female. It does not appear to be owing to the placental vessels; but to the uterine tumour pressing upon the large vessels of the mother.

BRUIT DE POT FÉLÉ, 'sound of a cracked vessel.' Cracked pot sound. A sound heard on percussion, when a cavern in the lungs is filled with air, and has a narrow outlet. It is not diagnostic, however.

BRUIT DE RACLEMENT, 'sound of scraping.' A sound produced by the scraping of hard, solid membranes, as the pericardium, against each other, very analogous to Bruit de craquement.

BRUIT DE RÂPE, 'sound of a rasp.' A sound heard during the contraction of either the auricles or ventricles. It is constant; and the contraction of the cavity is more prolonged than natural, and emits a hard, rough, and—as it were—stified sound.

It indicates contraction of the valvular orifices by cartilaginous deposits, or ossification, and is better heard near the apex of the heart, if the auriculo-ventricular valves be concerned,—near the base, if the semilunar valves be the seat of the disease.

BRUIT RESPIRATOIRE, Murmur, respiratory.

BRUIT DE SOUFFLE À DOUBLE COURANT, Bruit de Diable.

BRUIT DE SOUFFLET, Bruit de Soufflé, 'bellows' sound,' 'blowing sound.' A sound like that of a bellows, heard occasionally by the ear applied to the chest during the contraction of the ventricles, auricles, or large arteries. It coexists with affections of the heart, but is heard, also, without any disease of that organ,—whenever, indeed, an artery is compressed. An Encephalic bellows' sound, (F.) Bruit de soufflé céphalique, has been described by Drs. Fisher and Whitney. It is heard on applying the ear to the occiput or to the top of the head; and is considered to indicate turgescence of vessels, or inflammation. When such turgescence exists, the vessels are compressed, and the compression gives rise to the sound in question. [?]

BRUIT DE SOUFFLE CÉPHALIQUE, see Bruit de soufflet—b. de Soufflé placentaire, Bruit placentaire—b. de Soufflé utérin, Bruit placentaire—b. de Tiraillement, Bruit de craquement.

BRUIT DE SOUPAPE, 'valvular or flapping noise.' A sound heard in respiration, when a foreign body is in the air passages. It somewhat resembles the flapping of a valve; hence its French name.

BRUIT DE TAFFETAS, 'sound of taffeta.' 'Sarcenet sound.' A respiratory sound, so named, by M. Grisolle, from its resembling the sound caused by the tearing of a piece of taffeta; and which he considers to indicate hepatization of the lung, limited to the surface, in pneumonia.

BRUIT TYMPANIQUE, 'tympanic sound.' The clear sound afforded by percussing the stomach and intestines when containing air.

BRUIT UTÉRIN, B. placentaire.

sometimes signifies the groin—Inguen; at others, the inguinal glands; and at others, again, swelling or inflammation of these parts. The moderns apply the term to an inflammatory tumour seated in the groin or axilla, and they generally distinguish—1. Simple or Sympathetic Bubo, which is independent of any virus in the economy. 2. Veneereal Bubo, (F.) Bubon vénérien, which is occasioned by the venereal virus. 3. Pestilential Bubo, or B. symptomatic of the Plague. BUBON GALBANUM. The systematic name of a plant which has been supposed to afford galbanum; Meto'pion, Mato'rium. The plant is also called Fer'ula Africa'na, Oreoseli'num Africa'num, Ani'sum frutes'um galbavif'erum seu Africa'num frutes'cens, Seli'num Galbanum, Agasyll'is galbanum, The long-leaved or lovage-leaved Galbanum. Ord. Umbelliferæ. The plant can scarcely, however, be considered to be determined. By the Dublin College, it is referred to Opo'rdia Galbavif'era, Ord. Umbelliferæ. Galbanum is the gummi-resinous juice. Its odour is fetid, and taste bitter and acrid: the agglutinated tears are of a white colour, on a ground of reddish-brown. It forms an emulsion when triturated with water, and is soluble in proof spirits of wine, and vinegar: sp. gr. 1.212. It has been given as an antispasmodic and expectorant, in pill or emulsion. Dose, from gr. 10 to 60. Externally, it is applied as a cataplasm.

Bubon galbanum is a South African plant; and is reputed to be an excellent diuretic, under the name of Wild Celery. A decoction of the leaves is given in dropsy and gravel. According to Pape, the resinous matter, which exudes from the stem, differs in appearance, smell, and in every respect, from Gummi Galbanum.

Some surgeons have confined this term to hernia when limited to the groin, and have called the same affection, when it has descended to the scrotum, Oschœocel'è, Scrotal Hernia. The rupture passes through the abdominal ring; and, in consequence of the greater size of the opening in the male, it is more frequent in the male sex.

BUBONOREX'IS, from βουβων, 'the groin,' and ρηξις, 'a rupture.' A name given to bubonocèle when accompanied with a division of the pe-

CALCULI, ALTERNATING, see Calculi, urinary.

CALCULI, ARTHRIT'IC, Tophi, Tubercula arthrit'ica, Calculi arthrit'ici seu podagrici, Chalk-stones, Gout-stones, Nodes, (F.) Pierres crayeuses, Calculs arthritiques, Nœuds. Concretions, which form in the ligaments, and within the capsules of the joints, in persons affected with gout. They are composed of uric acid, soda, and a little animal matter; very rarely, urate of lime and chloride of sodium are met with. Similar calculi are found in other parts beside the joints.

CALCULI, BIL'IARY, Cal'culi bili'osi seu fellei seu bili'arii, Bil'iary Concretions, Gall-stones, Chololithus, Cholelithus, (F.) Calculs biliaires, Pierres au fiel, Angichololithe, — Piorry. Some of these contain all the materials of the bile, and seem to be nothing more than that secretion thickened. Several contain Picromel; and the greater part are composed of from 88 to 94 parts of Cholesterin, and of from 6 to 12 of the yellow matter of the bile. Biliary calculi are most frequently found in the gall-bladder: at other times, in the substance of the liver, in the branches of the Ductus hepaticus, or in the Ductus Communis Choleochus. The first are called Cystic; the second Hepatic; and the last, sometimes, Hepatocystic. The causes which give rise to them are very obscure. Often they occasion no uneasiness, and at other times the symptoms may be confounded with those of hepatitis. At times, they are rejected by the mouth, or by the bowels, along with a considerable quantity of bile, which had accumulated behind them; at other times they occasion violent abdominal inflammation, abscesses, and biliary fistulae, rupture of the gall-bladder, and fatal effusion into the peritoneum. The passage of a gall-stone is extremely painful; yet the pulse is not at first affected. Antiphlogistics, when there is inflammatory action, and strong doses of opium, to allay the pain and spasm, with the warm bath, are the chief remedies. Solvents are not to be depended upon. They cannot reach the calculi.

CALCULI, BONE EARTH, see Calculi, urinary—c. Compound, see Calculi, urinary—c. Cystic, see Calculi, urinary.

CALCULI OF THE EARS, (F.) Calculi de l'Oreille. Hard, light, and inflammable concretions, which occur in the meatus auditorius externus, and are merely indurated cerumen. They are a frequent cause of deafness. They can be easily seen, and may be extracted by appropriate forceps, after having been detached by injections of soap and water.

CALCULI FELLE, Calculi, biliary—c. Fusible, see Calculi, urinary.

CALCULI, LACHRYMAL, (F.) Calculi lacrymanæ. Concretions sometimes, but rarely, form in the lachrymal passages, where they occasion abscesses and fistulae, which do not heal until they are extracted. No analysis has been made of them.

CALCULI, LITHIC, see Calculi, urinary.

CALCULI OF THE MAMMÆ, (F.) Calculi des Mamelles. Haller gives a case of a concretion, of a yellowish-white colour, which had the shape of one of the excretory ducts of the mammary gland, having been extracted from an abscess seated in that organ.

CALCULI, MULBERRY, see Calculi, urinary.

CALCULI OF THE PANCREAS, (F.) Calculi du Pancreas. These are but little known. Analogy has induced a belief that they resemble the salivary. Some have supposed that certain transparent calculi, rejected by vomiting, or passed in the evacuations, have proceeded from the pancreas, but there seems to be no reason for this belief.

CALCULI OF THE PINEAL GLAND, (F.) Calculi de la Glande Pinéale. These have been frequently met with. No symptom announces their presence during life. They are composed of phosphate of lime.

CALCULI PODAGRICI, Calculi, arthritic.

CALCULI OF THE PROSTATE, Prostatie calculi. These are not very rare. They have generally the same composition as the preceding. They usually present the symptoms common to every tumefaction of the prostate, and sometimes those of calculi in the bladder.

CALCULI PULMONARY, (F.) Calculi pulmonaires. These concretions are very frequently met with in the dead body, without seeming to have produced unpleasant symptoms during life. At other times, they are accompanied with all the symptoms of phthisis, Litho-phthisis, Phthisis calculeuse, of Bayle. See Lithiasis pulmonum. At times they are expectorated without the supervention of any unpleasant symptom. They are usually formed of carbonate of lime and animal matter.

CALCULI, SALIVARY, Calculi salivales, Sialolithi, (F.) Calculi salivaires. Concretions, usually formed of phosphate of lime and animal matter, which are developed in the substance of the salivary glands or in their excretory ducts. In the first case, they may be mistaken for a simple swelling of the gland; in the second, they may generally be detected by the touch. They may be extracted by incision in the interior of the mouth. The calculus developed in the sublingual ducts has been called Calculus sublingualis and Ranula lapideæ.

CALCULI, SPERMATIC, (F.) Calculi spermaticæ. These have been sometimes found in the vesiculae seminales after death. They cannot be detected during life. No analysis has been made of them.

CALCULI OF THE STOMACH AND INTESTINES, Enterolithus, E. Calculus, Coprolithus, Concretiones alvi næ, (F.) Calculi de l'estomac, C. intestinalis ou stercoræux, Pierres stercorales, Concretions intestinales. Calculi of the stomach are rare, and have almost always been carried thither by the antiperistaltic action of the intestines. The symptoms occasioned by them are those of chronic gastritis. It has been imagined that the continued use of absorbent powders, as magnesia, will give occasion to them.

Intestinal concretions, (F.) Calculi intestinalis, are not uncommon in animals (see BEZOARD;) but they are rare in man. The causes which give rise to them are little known: sometimes a biliary calculus affords them a nucleus. Their composition varies. They are light, hard, very fetid, and not inflammable. They are formed, ordinarily, between the valvulae of the small intestines, or in the cells of the large, and sometimes in old hernia. Whilst they do not obstruct the passage of the alimentary mass, they produce no unpleasant symptoms. At times, the movable tumour which they form may be felt through the parietes of the abdomen. They are generally evacuated per anum.

CALCULI OF THE TONSILS. Calculous concretions, which sometimes form in the tonsils. (F.) Calculi des Amygdales. They are easily recognised by the sight and touch: sometimes they are discharged by spitting, either alone or with the pus of an abscess occasioned by their presence. They have not been analyzed.

CALCULI, TRIPLE, see Calculi, urinary—c. Uric, see Calculi, urinary.

CALCULI, URINARY, Urolithi, (F.) Calculi urinaires, Pierres urinaires. Concretions which form from the crystallizable substances in the urine, and which are met with not only in the whole course of the urinary passages, but in fistulous openings wherever the urine stagnates naturally or accidentally. Their causes are but little known. They are more common at the two extremities of life than at the middle, and more so in some countries and districts than in others. At times, a clot of blood, a portion of mucus, &c., form the nucleus. The symptoms and treatment vary according to the seat of the calculus. There is no such thing probably as a medical solvent. See Urinary Calculi.

Chymists have demonstrated the existence of several components of urinary calculi, viz., Lithic Acid, Phosphate of Lime, Ammoniac-Magnesian Phosphate, Oxalate of Lime, Cystic Oxide, and Xanthic Oxide, with an animal cementing ingredient. The varieties of calculi, produced by the combination or intermixture of these ingredients, are thus represented by Dr. Paris.

A TABULAR VIEW OF DIFFERENT SPECIES OF URINARY CALCULI.

SPECIES OF CALCULI.	EXTERNAL CHARACTERS.	CHEMICAL COMPOSITION.	REMARKS.
1. LITHIC OR URIC.	FORM, a flattened oval. S. G. generally exceeds 1.500. Colour, brownish or fawn-like. Surface, smooth. Texture, laminated.	It consists principally of Lithic Acid . When treated with nitric acid, a beautiful pink substance results. This calculus is slightly soluble in water, abundantly so in the pure alkalies.	It is the prevailing species; but the surface sometimes occurs finely tuberculated. It frequently constitutes the nuclei of the other species.
2. MULBERRY, (F.) Calculus murax.	Colour, dark brown. Texture, harder than that of the other species. S. G. from 1.428 to 1.976. Surface, studded with tubercles.	It is oxalate of lime , and is decomposed in the flame of a spirit lamp swelling out into a white efflorescence, which is quicklime .	This species includes some varieties, which are remarkably smooth and pale-coloured, resembling hempseed .
3. BONE EARTH	Colour, pale brown or gray; surface, smooth and polished; structure, regularly laminated; the laminae easily separating into concrete crusts.	Principally phosphate of lime . It is soluble in muriatic acid.
4. TRIPLE.	Colour, generally brilliant white. Surface, uneven, studded with shining crystals, less compact than the preceding species. Between its laminae small cells occur, filled with sparkling particles.	It is an ammoniac-magnesian phosphate , generally mixed with phosphate of lime. Pure alkalies decompose it, extracting its ammonia.	This species attains a larger size than any of the others.
5. FUSIBLE.	Colour, grayish white.	A compound of the two foregoing species.	It is very fusible, melting into a vitreous globule.
6. CYSTIC.	Very like the triple calculus, but it is unstratified and more compact and homogenous.	It consists of cystic oxide . Under the blowpipe it yields a peculiarly fetid odour. It is soluble in acids, and in alkalies, even if they are fully saturated with carbonic acid.	It is a rare species.
7. ALTERNATING.	Its section exhibits different concentric laminae.	Compounded of several species, alternating with each other.
8. COMPOUND.	No characteristic form.	The ingredients are separable only by chymical analysis.

1. Renal Calculi, (F.) Calculus rénaux. These have almost always a very irregular shape: at times, there is no indication of their presence: at others, they occasion attacks of pain in the kidneys, sometimes accompanied with bloody or turbid urine. Often, they cause inflammation of the kidneys, with all its unpleasant results. They are generally formed of uric acid, animal matter, and oxalate of lime, with, sometimes, phosphates. The treatment will have to vary, according to the absence or presence of inflammatory signs,—relieving the irritation by opiates. A surgical operation can rarely be applicable.

2. Calculi of the Ureters, (F.) Calculus des Urètres. These come from the kidneys, and do not produce unpleasant effects, unless they are so large as to obstruct the course of the urine, and to occasion distension of the whole of the ureters above them; or unless their surface is so rough as to irritate the mucous membrane, and occasion pain, hemorrhage, abscesses, &c. The pain, during the passage, is very violent, extending, at times, to the testicle of the same side in the male; and occasioning a numbness of the thigh in both sexes. The treatment consists in general or local blood-letting, warm bath, and opiates.

3. Calculi, Vesical; Stone in the Bladder, Lith'ia Vesicalis, Lith'iasis cyst'ica seu vesical'is, Cysto-lith'iasis, Dys'uria calculo'sa seu irritata, Calculus vesicæ, (F.) Calculus vésicaux. These are the most common. Sometimes, they proceed from the kidneys: most commonly, they are formed in the bladder itself. Sense of weight in the perinæum, and sometimes of a body rolling when the patient changes his position; pain or itching at the extremity of the glans in men; frequent desire to pass the urine; sudden stoppage to its flow; and bloody urine—are the chief signs which induce a suspicion of their existence. We cannot, however, be certain of this without sounding the patient. Sometimes, when of a small size, they are expelled: most commonly, they remain in the bladder, the disorganization of which they occasion, unless removed by a surgical operation.

4. Calculi, Ure'thral. These almost always proceed from the bladder. The obstruction, which they cause to the passage of the urine, the hard tumour, and the noise occasioned when struck by a sound, indicate their presence. They are removed by incision.

5. Calculi of Fistulous passages. These arise when there is some fistulous opening into the urethra. They can be readily recognised, and may generally be extracted with facility. (F.) Calculus placés hors des voies urinaires. See Urinary Calculi.

CALCULI OF THE UTERUS, (F.) Calculus de l'Utérus. These are very rare. The signs, which indicate them during life, are those of chronic engorgement of the uterus. Their existence, consequently, cannot be proved till after death.

CALCULUS, Lapis, Lithos. A diminutive of calc, a lime-stone. (F.) Calcul, Pierre. Calculi are concretions, which may form in every part of the animal body, but are most frequently found in the organs that act as reservoirs, and in the excretory canals. They are met with in the tonsils, joints, biliary ducts, digestive passages, lachrymal ducts, mammæ, pancreas, pineal gland, prostate, lungs, salivary, spermatic and urinary passages, and in the uterus. The causes which give rise to them are obscure.

Those that occur in reservoirs or ducts are supposed to be owing to the deposition of the substances, which compose them, from the fluid as it passes along the duct; and those which occur in the substance of an organ are regarded as the product of some chronic irritation. Their general effect is to irritate, as extraneous bodies, the parts with which they are in contact; and to produce retention of the fluid, whence they have been formed. The symptoms differ, according to the sensibility of the organ and the importance of the particular secretion whose discharge they impede. Their solution is generally impracticable: spontaneous expulsion or extraction is the only way of getting rid of them.

This name is given, also, to the Anime.

CANCAMY, Anime.

CAN/CELLATED, Cancellatus, (F.) Cancellé; from Cancelli, 'lattice-work.' Formed of cancelli, as the 'cancellated structure of bone.'

CAN/CELLI, 'Lattice-work.' The Cellular or Spongy Texture of Bones, (F.) Tissu celluleux; consisting of numerous cells, communicating with each other. They contain a fatty matter, analogous to marrow. This texture is met with, principally, at the extremities of long bones; and some of the short bones consist almost wholly of it. It allows of the expansion of the extremities of bones, without adding to their weight, and deadens concussions.

CANCEL/LUS, from cancer, 'a crab.' A species of crayfish, called the Wrong Heir, and Bernard the Hermit: which is said to cure rheumatism, if rubbed on the part.

CANCER, 'a crab.' Carcinoma, Lupus cancerosus. A disease, so called either on account of the hideous appearance which the ulcerated cancer presents, or on account of the great veins which surround it, and which the ancients compared to the claws of the crab: called also Carcinoma. It consists of a scirrhus, livid tumour, intersected by firm, whitish, divergent bands; and occurs chiefly in the secretory glands. The pains are acute and lancinating, and often extend to other parts. The tumour, ultimately, terminates in a fetid and ichorous ulcer,—Ulcus cancerosum. It is distinguished, according to its stages, into occuli, Cancer oculi, and open, C. aper'tus; the former being the scirrhus, the latter the ulcerated condition. At times, there is a simple destruction or erosion of the organ, at others, an encephaloid or cerebriform, and, at others, again, a colloid degeneration.

For its production, it requires a peculiar diathesis, or cachexia. The following table, from Dr. Walshe, exhibits the characters of the three species of carcinoma:

The use of irritants in cancerous affections is strongly to be deprecated. When the disease is so situate that excision can be practised, and the constitution does not exhibit great contamination, the sooner it is removed the better.

Encephaloid.	Scirrhus.	Colloid.
Resembles lobulated cerebral matter.	Resembles rind of bacon traversed by cellulose-fibrous septa.	Has the appearance of particles of jelly inlaid in a regular alveolar bed.
Is commonly opaque from its earliest formation.	Has a semi-transparent glossiness.	The contained matter is strikingly transparent.
Is of a dead white colour.	Has a clear whitish or bluish yellow tint.	Greenish yellow is its predominant hue.
Contains a multitude of minute vessels.	Is comparatively ill-supplied with vessels.	Its vessels have not been sufficiently examined as yet.
Is less hard and dense than scirrhus.	Is exceedingly firm and dense.	The jelly-like matter is exceedingly soft; a colloid mass is, however, firm and resisting.
Is frequently found in the veins issuing from the diseased mass.	Has not been distinctly detected in this situation.	The pulsatious variety has been detected in the veins.
The predominant microscopical elements are globular, not always distinctly cellular, and caudate corpuscula.	The main microscopical constituents are juxtaposed nuclear cells; caudate corpuscula do not exist in it.	Is composed of shells in a state of emboitement .
Occasionally attains an enormous bulk.	Rarely acquires larger dimensions than an orange.	Observes a mean in this respect.
Has been observed in almost every tissue of the body.	Its seat, as ascertained by observation, is somewhat more limited.	Has so far been seen in a limited number of parts only.
Very commonly co-exists in several parts or organs of the same subject.	Is not unusually solitary.	Has rarely been met with in more than one organ.
Is remarkable for its occasional vast rapidity of growth.	Ordinarily grows slowly.	Grows with a medium degree of rapidity.
Is frequently the seat of interstitial hemorrhage and deposition of black or bistre-coloured matter.	Is comparatively rarely the seat of these changes.
When softened into a pulp, appears as a dead white or pink opaque matter of creamy consistence.	Resembles, when softened, a yellowish brown semitransparent gelatinous matter.	Undergoes no visible change of the kind.
Subcutaneous tumours are slow to contract adhesion with the skin.	Scirrhus thus situate usually becomes adherent.
Ulcerated encephaloid is frequently the seat of hemorrhage, followed by rapid fungous development.	Scirrhus ulcers much less frequently give rise to hemorrhage; and fungous growths (provided they retain the scirrhus character) are now more slowly and less abundantly developed.
The progress of the disease after ulceration is commonly very rapid.	There is not such a remarkable change in the rate of progress of the disease after ulceration has set in.
It is the most common form under which secondary cancer exhibits itself.
Is the species of cancer most frequently observed in young subjects.	Is much less common before puberty.	Has so far been observed in adults only.

This fly — Order, Coleoptera — originally, perhaps, a native of Italy and Spain, is now found in France, Germany, Hungary, Russia, Siberia, and England. It is, however, rare in the last-named country. It is found in species of Oleaceæ — as the ash, privet, and lilac; and of Caprifoliaceæ — as the elder and lonicera. It is much employed in medicine, and is the most common vesicatory. Given internally, and even when absorbed from the skin, it affects the urinary organs, exciting strangury. This may be prevented, in cases of blisters, by interposing between the blistering plaster and skin a piece of tissue-paper. Diluents relieve the strangury. Dose, half a grain to one grain. If kept dry, the flies will retain their activity for many years. Their active principle — Can'tharidin, Can'tharid'ina — has been separated from them.

Cantharis vesicatoria is the ordinary blistering insect used in Europe.

The disease commonly occurs between the third and ninth month, and is characterized by excessive dyspnoea, accompanied by a loud croupy noise on inspiration; the thumbs being locked, and the hands and feet rigidly bent for a longer or shorter period. The seat of the disease is evidently in the cerebro-spinal axis, primarily or secondarily: generally, perhaps, it is owing to erethism seated elsewhere, but communicated to the cerebro-spinal centre, and reflected to the respiratory and other muscles concerned. It seems to be connected with dental irritation; and consequently, in the treatment, where such is the case, the gums should be freely divided; after which, cathartics and revulsives, with the use of narcotics and appropriate diet, will generally remove the affection; for although extremely alarming, it is often not attended with great danger. CATARACT, Catarac'ta, Catarrhac'ta, Suffu'sio Oculi, S. Lentis crystall'inæ, Phtharma catarac'ta, Cali'go lentis, Gutta opa'ca, Hypoc'hyma, Hopoc'hysis, Hopoph'ysis, Phacosoto'ma, Parop'sis catarac'ta, Glauco'ma Woulhou'si, from καταρασσειν, (κατα and ρασσειν), 'to tumble down.' A deprivation of sight, which comes on as if a veil fell before the eyes. Cataract consists in opacity of the crystalline lens or its capsule, which prevents the passage of the rays of light, and precludes vision. The causes are obscure. Diagnosis. — The patient is blind, the pupil seems closed by an opaque body, of variable colour, but commonly whitish: — the pupil contracting and dilating. Cataracts have been divided, by some, into spurious and genuine. The former, where the obstacle to vision is between the capsule of the lens and the uvea: the latter, where it is in the lens or capsule. A lenticular cataract is where the affection is seated in the lens; — a capsular or membranous, in the capsule. The capsular is divided again, by Beer, into the anterior, posterior, and complete capsular cataract. When the capsule is rendered opaque, in consequence of an injury, which cuts or ruptures any part of it, it thickens, becomes leathery, and has been called Catarac'ta arida siliquosa. Catarac'ta Morgagniana lactea seu purifor'mis is the milky variety, in which the crystalline is transformed into a liquid similar to milk, (F.) Cataracte laiteuse; or, as generally defined, in which there is opacity of the fluid situate between the lens and its capsule. The capsulo-lenticular affects both lens and capsule, (Achrysaliodiaphanie, Adiaphanie péricrystallique — Piorry,) and Beer conceives the liquor Morgagni, in an altered state, may contribute to it. Cataracts are also called hard, soft (Phacomalacia), stony, (F. pierreuse), milky or cheesy (laiteuse ou caséuse), Galactocata- rac'ta, Catarac'ta lacticolor, according to their density: — white, pearly, yellow, brown, gray, green, black, (F.) blanche, perlée, jaune, brune, grise, verte, noire, according to their colour: — fixed or vacillating — catarac'ta capsulo-lenticularis fixa vel trem'ula, (F.) fixe ou branlante, according as they are fixed or movable behind the pupil. They are likewise called Catarac'tæ marmoracia, fenestra'tæ, stella'tæ, puncta'tæ, dimidia'tæ, &c., according to the appearances they present.

They may be simple, or complicated with adhesion, amaurosis, specks, &c.; and primary or primitive, when opaque before the operation; — secondary, when the opacity is the result of the operation.

The following classification of cataracts is by M. Desmarres: —

- Pigmentous.

Cataract is commonly a disease of elderly individuals, although, not unfrequently, congenital. It forms slowly; objects are at first seen as through a mist; light bodies appear to fly before the eyes, and it is not until after months or years that the sight is wholly lost. No means will obviate the evil except an operation, which consists in removing the obstacle to the passage of the light to the retina. Four chief methods are employed for this purpose. 1. Couching or Depression, Hyalonic'is, Hyalonyx'is, (F.) Abaissement, Déplacement de la Cataracte. This consists in passing a cataract needle through the scleroticæ and subjacent membranes, a little above the transverse diameter of the eye; and at about two lines' distance from the circumference of the transparent cornea, until the point arrives in the posterior chamber of the eye. With this the crystalline is depressed to the outer and lower part of the globe of the eye, where it is left. 2. By absorption, — by the French termed broiement or bruising. This is performed in the same manner as the former; except that, instead of turning the crystalline from the axis of the visual rays, it is divided by the cutting edge of the needle, and its fragments are scattered in the humours of the eye, where they are absorbed. 3. By extraction, which consists in opening, with a particular kind of knife, the transparent cornea and the anterior portion of the capsule of the crystalline; and causing the lens to issue through the aperture. Each of the processes has its advantages and disadvantages, and all are used by surgeons. 4. Some, again, pass a cataract needle through the transparent cornea and pupil to the crystalline, and depress or cause its absorption. This is called Ceratonyxis. See, also, Reclination.

CATARRH, Catar'rhus, Catar'rhopus, Catar'rhema, Rheuma, Deflux'io, Catastag'mus, Phlegmatorrhag'ia, Phlegmatorrhœ'a, from κατα, 'downwards,' and ρῶω, 'I flow.' A discharge of fluid from a mucous membrane. The ancients considered catarrh as a simple flux, and not as an inflammation. Generally it partakes of this character, however. Catarrh is, with us, usually restricted to inflammation of the mucous membrane of the air-passages: the French extend it to that of all mucous membranes; (F.) Flux muqueux, Fluxion catarrhale.

Catarrhe pulmonaire, Fièvre Catarrhale, Rhume de Poitrine*, is a superficial inflammation of the mucous follicles of the trachea and bronchi. It is commonly an affection of but little consequence, but apt to relapse and become chronic. It is characterized by cough, thirst, lassitude, fever, watery eyes, with increased secretion of mucus from the air-passages. The antiphlogistic regimen and time usually remove it. Sometimes, the inflammation of the bronchial tubes is so great as to prove fatal.

CAUSE, Causa, Ai'tia, Ai'tion. An act which precedes another, and seems to be a necessary condition for the concurrence of the latter. The causes of disease are generally extremely obscure; although they, sometimes, are evident enough. The predisponent and occasional causes are the only two on which any stress can be laid; but as authors have divided them differently, a short explanation is necessary.

CAUSE, AC'CESSORY, (F.) Cause Accessoire. One which has only a secondary influence in the production of disease.

CAUSES, ACCIDENT'AL, Common Causes, (F.) Causes Accidentelles, are those which act only in certain given conditions; and which do not always produce the same disease. Cold, e. g., may be the accidental cause of pneumonia, rheumatism, &c.

CAUSES, INTERN'AL, (F.) Causes Internes, are those which arise within the body; as mental emotions, &c.

CAUSES, MECHAN'ICAL, (F.) Causes mécaniques, are those which act mechanically, as pressure upon the windpipe in inducing suffocation.

CAUSES, NEGATIVE, (F.) Causes négatives, comprise all those things, the privation of which may derange the functions;—as abstinence too long continued. They are opposed to positive causes, which, of themselves, directly induce disease;—as the use of indigestible food, spirituous drinks, &c.

CAUSES, OBSCURE, C. Occult.

CAUSES, OCCASIONAL, Exciting Causes, Causes actuelles, (F.) Causes occasionelles, are those which immediately produce disease. The occasional causes have been divided into the cognizable and non-cognizable.—C. J. B. Williams.

CAUTER'RIUM, C. actualĕ, Cauter, Caustery, Inus'torium, Ruptorium, Ignis actualis, from καω, 'I burn,' καωρη, 'a burner.' (F.) Cautĕre, Feu actuel. A substance, used for 'firing,' burning or disorganizing the parts to which it is applied. Cauteries were divided by the ancients into actual and potential. The word is now restricted to the red-hot iron; or to positive burning. It was, formerly, much used for preventing hemorrhage from divided arteries; and also with the same views as a blister. The term Potential Caustery, Cauterium potentia'le, Ignis potentia'lis, (F.) Feu potentiel, was generally applied to the causticum commune, but it is now used synonymously with caustic in general. Cautĕre also means an issue.

CAUTERIZA'TION, Cauterisa'tio, Cauteriasmus, Exus'tio, Inus'tio, Caus'tica Adus'tio. Firing. The effect of a cautery or caustic. The French, amongst whom cauterization is much used, distinguished five kinds: 1. Cauterisation Inhĕrente, which consists in applying the actual cautery freely, and with a certain degree of force, so as to disorganize deeply. 2. Cauterisation transcurrente, which consists in passing the edge of the Cautĕre cultellaire, or the point of the Cautĕre conique lightly, so as not to disorganize deeply. 3. Cauterisation par pointes, which consists in applying on the skin, here and there, the hot point of the conical cautery, with sufficient force to cauterize the whole thickness of the skin. 4. Cauterisation lente, slow cauterization, by means of the moxa. 5. Cauterisation objective, which consists in holding the cautery at some distance from the part to be acted upon by it.

The vena cava superior, thoracica seu descendens, is formed by the union of the subclavians; and receives successively, before its termination at the upper part of the right auricle, the inferior thyroid, right internal mammary, superior diaphragmatic, azygos, &c. The vena cava inferior, abdominalis seu ascendens, arises from the union of the two primary iliaes, opposite the fourth or fifth lumbar vertebra, receives the middle sacral, lumbar, right spermatic, hepatic, and inferior diaphragmatics, and opens at the posterior and inferior part of the right auricle.

CAVERNOUS BODIES, Corpora Cavernosa of the penis, Corpora nervosa seu Nerveo-spongiosa Penis, (F.) Corps Caverneux. The corpus cavernosum is a kind of cylindrical sac, composed of cells; separated, through its whole extent, by a vertical, incomplete septum, Septum pectiniformĕ, Trabecula corporum cavernosorum, and forming nearly two-thirds of the penis. The corpus cavernosum, on each side, arises from the ascending portion of the ischium, and terminates obtusely behind the glans. The arteries of the corpora cavernosa come from the internal pudic. See Helicine Arteries. Nerves are found on the surface of the outer membrane, but they do not appear to penetrate the substance, and the smooth muscular fibre has been traced into the fibrous parietes of the cells, as in the case of all erectile tissues.

J. Müller's researches have led him to infer, that both in man and the horse, the nerves of the corpora cavernosa are made up of branches proceeding from the organic as well as the animal system, whilst the nerves of animal life alone provide the nerves of sensation of the penis.

CAVERNOUS BODIES, Corpora Cavernosa of the Clitoris, are two hollow crura, forming the clitoris.

CAVERNOUS BODY OF THE VAGI'NA, Corpus Cavernosum Vaginae, Plexus retiformis, is a substance composed of blood-vessels and cells, similar to those of the penis and clitoris, which covers the outer extremity of the vagina, on each side. It serves to contract the entrance to the vagina during coition.

CAVERNOUS GANGLION, see Carotid or Carotic Nerve.

CAVERNOUS RESPIR'ATION. When a cavity exists in the lungs, and one or more ramifications of the bronchia terminate in it, a loud tubal noise is emitted, provided the cavity be not filled with fluid, which is called cavernous respiration. In this condition, the cough is cavernous likewise. (F.) Toux Caverneuse. When the capacity of the cavern is very great, the sound of the respiration is like that produced by blowing into a decanter, with the mouth at a little distance from the neck. This kind of cavernous respiration has been called amphoric, from amphora, 'a flask;' (F.) Respiration amphorique, Souffle amphorique, S. métallique.

The Veiled Puff, (F.) Souffle voilé, is a modification of the cavernous respiration, in which, according to Laënnec, "a sort of movable veil interposed between the excavation and the ear" seems to be agitated to and fro. It is a sign which is not attended to.

CAVERNOUS SINUS, Sinus Cavernosus seu polymorphus seu sphenoidalis, Receptaculum sellæ equinæ lateribus appositum, (F.) Sinus cavernosus. The Cavernous Sinuses are venous cavities of the dura mater, filled with a multitude of reddish, soft filaments, intersecting each other; and, as it were, reticulated. They commence behind the inner part of the sphenoid fissure, pass backwards on the sides of the fossa pituitaria, and terminate by opening into a cavity, common to the superior and inferior petrosal sinuses. They receive some meningeal veins, the ophthalmic veins, &c. The anterior extremity of each cavernous sinus has been named the ophthalmic sinus.

CAVERNOUS TEXTURE OR TISSUE, Tela cavernosa, (F.) Tissu cavernosus. The spongy substance which forms the greater part of the penis and clitoris. It seems to consist of a very complicated lace-work of arteries and veins; and, probably, of nervous filaments, with small fibrous plates, which form by their decussation numerous cells communicating with each other. This spongy texture produces erection, by dilating and swelling on the influx of blood; and probably, also, by virtue of some property inherent in it.

of the cerebellum: a variety of phrenitis or encephalitis.

CEREBEL'LOUS, Cerebello'sus, from cerebellum, 'the little brain.' (F.) Cérébelleux. Chausier has given this epithet to the vessels of the cerebellum. These are three in number; two of which are inferior: the larger, inferior cerebelli, which arises from the posterior cerebral or vertebral; and the smaller, whose existence is not constant, from the meso-cephalic or basilar:—the third, called A. cérébelleuse supérieure (superior cerebelli), is also a branch of the basilar.

The cerebellum is divided into two lobes or hemispheres or lateral masses, Lobus superior anterior seu quadrangula'ris, and Lobus superior posterior seu semiluna'ris, and each lobe is again subdivided into Monticuli or Lobules. In the cerebellum are to be observed the crura cerebelli, the fourth ventricle, the valvula magna cerebri, the processus vermiculares, superior and inferior, &c.

CEREBRAL AR'TERIES are three on each side:—the anterior or artery of the corpus callosum, and the middle, arte'ria Sylviana, are furnished by the internal carotid:—the posterior or posterior and inferior artery of the brain, A. profunda cerebri, arises from the vertebral. Chausier calls these arteries lobaires, because they correspond with the anterior, middle, and posterior lobes, whilst he calls the trunks, whence they originate, cerebral.

CEREBRAL NERVES are those which arise within the cranium, (F.) Nerfs craniens, all of which, perhaps, with the exception of the olfactory, originate from the medulla oblongata. See Nerves.

CER'EBRUM or CERE'BRUM, from kapa, 'the head.' The brain. (F.) Cerveau, Cerveille. This term is sometimes applied to the whole of the contents of the cranium: at others, to the upper portion;—the posterior and inferior being called cerebellum. The brain, properly so called, extends from the os frontis to the superior occipital fossæ. Anteriorly, it rests on the orbital vault; behind this, on the middle fossæ of the base of the cranium; and, posteriorly, on the tentorium cerebelli superectensum. The upper surface is divided by a deep median cleft (Scissure interlobaire,—Ch.) into two halves, called hemispheres, which are united at the base by the corpus callosum. At its surface are numerous convolutions. The inferior surface exhibits, from before to behind, three lobes, distinguished into anterior, middle, and posterior. The middle is separated from the anterior by the fissure of SYLVIVS; and from the posterior, by a shallow furrow which corresponds to the upper portion of the pars petrosa. Internally, the brain has, on the median line, the corpus callosum, septum lucidum, fornic, pineal gland, and third ventricle:—and laterally, the lateral ventricles, in which are the corpora striata, optic thalami, &c. It is contained in a triple envelope, (see Meninges.) Its texture is pulpy, and varies according to age. Two substances may be distinguished in it—the white, medullary, tubular or fibrous—medulla cerebri, (F.) Pulpe cérébral, and the cortical, cineritious, vesicular, or gray. The former is white; and occupies all the interior and base of the brain. The latter is grayish and softer. It is situate particularly at the surface of the organ.

The brain receives several arterial vessels, furnished by the internal carotid and vertebral. Its veins end in the sinuses. It is the material organ of the mental and moral manifestations. According to Gall, each part is the special seat of one of those faculties, and the brain and cerebellum, inclusive, are called by him 'the nervous system of the mental faculties.' See Craniology.

The substance of the nervous system—Neurine—has been analyzed by Vauquelin, and found to contain water, 80.00; white fatty matter, 4.53; red fatty matter, called cerebrine, 0.70; osmazome, 1.12; albumen, 7.00; phosphorus, 1.50; sulphur, acid phosphates of potassa, lime, and magnesia, 5.15.

A cutaneous affection, characterized by one or more broad, irregular-shaped patches, of a yellow or yellowish-brown colour, occurring most frequently on the front of the neck, breast, abdomen, and groins. The patches do not generally rise above the surface. There is usually some degree of itching. A cryptogamous growth has been found in it, to which M. Robin gives the name Microsporion furfur.

The causes are not very evident. Sulphur externally—in any and every form—generally removes it speedily. Should there be difficulty, the external use of the remedy in baths or fumigations may succeed.

So far as we know, this is an elementary substance. It is a greenish, yellow gas, of a strong suffocating smell, and disagreeable taste: incapable of maintaining combustion and respiration, and very soluble in water. One of its characteristics is, that of destroying, almost immediately, all vegetable and animal colours. It is employed in fumigations as a powerful disinfecting agent. A very dilute solution, Aqua seu Liquor Chlorini, Chlorin'ii Liquor (Ph. D.), Chlorin'ei aqua (Ph. E.), Chlorine water, (F.) Chlore liquide, has been administered internally, in certain cases of diarrhœa and chronic dysentery. Immersion of the hands and arms in it has often removed itch and other cutaneous affections. It has also been inhaled in a dilute state in the early stage of phthisis, but it is of doubtful efficacy, and is better adapted for chronic bronchitis.

CHLOROFORM, Chloroformum, Chloroform'ium, Carbo'neum chlora'tum, Superchlor'idum formyl'icum, Perchloride and Terchloride of Formyl, Chloroform'yl, called also, but not correctly, Terchloride of Carbon, and Chloric ether, Æther chlor'icus;—(F.) Chloroforme, Chloréthéride, so called on account of the connexion of chlorine with formic acid, is a colourless, oleaginous liquid, of a sweetish ethereal odour, hot, aromatic, and peculiar taste. The specific gravity of that of the Ph. U. S. is 1.49. It may be obtained by distilling from a mixture of chlorinated lime and alcohol,—rectifying the product by redistillation, first from a great excess of chlorinated lime, and afterwards from strong sulphuric acid. It has been used with advantage in asthma, and in diseases in which a grateful soothing agent is required. Dose fʒss to fʒj, diluted with water.

It has likewise been prescribed with great success as an anæsthetic agent in spasmodic diseases; and to obtund sensibility in surgical operations and in parturition,—especially in the way of inhalation; but its use requires caution. See Anæsthetic.

A disease which affects young females, more particularly those who have not menstruated. It is characterized by a pale, lurid complexion, languor, listlessness, depraved appetite and digestion, palpitation, &c. The disease generally goes off on the occurrence of the menstrual flux; but sometimes it is long before this is established, and, at times, the catamenia are in much larger quantity than usual. To this last form M. Trousseau has given the name chlorose hémorrhagique.

The blood of chlorosis is generally thin, light-coloured and deficient in red corpuscles: and, according to Piorry, in iron,—achalythémie; and the clot is in less proportion to the serum than in health. On auscultation, a bellows' sound has been almost invariably detected over the heart, and a continuous blowing sound in the larger arteries, (especially the carotids and subclavians,) re-enforced by each systole of the ventricle, and resembling the buzzing of a humming-top, the cooing of doves, the whistling of air through a key-hole, &c., (see Bruit.) Very similar sounds are heard in the arteries after copious hemorrhage: they seem, therefore, to coincide with enfeebled circulation.

Tonics—as iron—are usually required in the treatment,—the disease most commonly occurring in those in whom there is considerable torpor of the system.

CHOC'OLATE, Chocolatum, Chocola'ta, Succola'ta, Succocolla'ta. Dr. Alston says, that this word is compounded from two East Indian words:—choco, 'sound,' and atte, 'water,' because of the noise made in its preparation [?]. An alimentary paste prepared from the kernels of Theobroma cacao or Cacao, with sugar, and often aromatics. (See Cacao.) The chocolate thus simply prepared—as it is met with, indeed, in commerce—is called in France, Chocolat de santé, Chocola'ta simplex seu Salu'tis. It is not very easy of digestion.

The chocolat à la vanille contains three ounces of vanilla and two of cinnamon to twenty pounds of common chocolate. The addition of the aromatic renders it somewhat more digestible. Chocolates may likewise be medicated.

In temperate climates, common cholera is not usually a disease of much consequence. It requires that the stomach and bowels should be cleared, and afterwards the irritation be allayed by full doses of opium. In malignant cholera, large doses of calomel, with opiates, form the great reliance of many practitioners. In the worst forms, however, it runs its course, unmodified by treatment.

CHOLÉRA EUROPÉEN, see Cholera—c. Indian, see Cholera—c. Indica, see Cholera.

CHOLÉRA INFANTUM, Chol'eric Fever of Infants; Cholera of Infants. A disease so termed by American physicians. It occurs, generally, in the middle states of the Union, in June or July, and continues during the hot weather, hence called the 'summer complaint.' The chief symptoms are vomiting, purging of green or yellow matter, slime or blood, attended with pain or uneasiness; and swelling of the abdomen, with some pyrexia, generally. The heat of the weather seems to be the predisposing, if not the exciting, cause. It is a fatal disease in towns; differing little, if at all, from what is vulgarly called the Watery Gripes in England. Clearing, gently, the alimentary canal, so as to remove the offending matter, and then exhibiting chalk mixture and laudanum, with counter-irritants, as sinapisms to the abdomen, is the most satisfactory plan of treatment.

CHORION, χοριον, 'skin,' from χωρειν, 'to contain,' include; [?] Camis'ia Fetûs: the chemise or shirt of the fetus in utero. A thin, transparent membrane, formerly confounded with the decidua, which surrounds the fetus in utero on every side, and appears to be developed from nucleated cells formed in the Fallopian tube. Some histologists, however, consider, that it exists in the ovary. The general opinion is, that it is formed as above described; and perhaps, also, from the zona pellucida, which disappears in the tube. In the uterus, villous prolongations are formed on its surface, which have given it, with more recent writers, the name 'shaggy chorion.' These villi are probably the agents of the absorption of nutritive matter furnished from the lining membrane of the uterus.

By many anatomists, the chorion is considered to be formed of two layers; the outer, called by Burdach Exochorion: the inner, Endochorion. By others, the distinction of laminæ is denied. It is exterior to the amnion.

CHORION also means the true skin. See CUTIS. By some, the Zona pellucida is so called.

internally. The part behind the iris is called Uvea. It is situate between the sclerotica and retina, has an opening, posteriorly, for the passage of the optic nerve; and terminates, anteriorly, at the great circumference of the iris, where it is continuous with the ciliary processes. According to Ruysch, the choroid consists of two layers, to the innermost of which his son gave the name Tu'nica seu Membrana Ruyschia'na, M. chorio-capilla'ris, (F.) Membrane Ruyschienne. The internal surface of the membrane is covered with a dark pigment, consisting of several layers of pigment cells, called Pigmentum nigrum, Stratum pigmenti, Ophthalmochroïtes, Ethiops animal, Mélanine, Matière ou Principe de la Mélanose, (F.) Enduit choroïdien. It is of a whitish appearance; and is formed from the chyme in the duodenum, and the rest of the small intestines, by the chyloferous vessels, which arise at the mucous surface of the intestine. Along these it passes through the mesenteric glands to the thoracic duct, and is finally poured into the left subclavian. It is composed, like the blood, of a fluid—liquor chyli—and of Chyle corpuscles or globules, the average size of which is about 1-4600th of an inch. See Chyme.

CHYMI'STRY, Chem'istry, Chemi'a, Chymi'a, Chimi'a, Chemeu'tice, Chemo'licæ, Philosoph'ia per ignem, Spagy'ria, Pyrotech'nia, Pyrosoph'ia, Ars hermet'ica seu mago'rum seu separato'ria seu spagy'ria, Archim'agia, from χυμος, 'juice,' or from Arab, chema, 'a secret.' (F.) Chimie ou Chymie. A branch of the natural sciences, whose object is to investigate the nature and properties of bodies, simple and compound, inorganic and organized; and to study the force or power, by virtue of which every combination is effected. It investigates the action between the integrant molecules or atoms of bodies.

Organ'ic Chemistry, Chymi'a organ'ica, Organochemi'a, is the chymistry of organized substances,—animal and vegetable. Animal Chym'istry, Zoëch'emy or Zoëch'ymy, Zoochemi'a, is the chymistry of substances afforded by the dead or living animal body. This branch of chymistry has been farther subdivided into physiological, when it considers the changes produced in organized bodies in health,—pathological, when it regards those produced by organic or other diseases. Anthropochem'ymy, Anthrochemi'a, is the chymistry of the human body. Chymistry is called Therapeutical or Pharmaceut'ical, Pharmaco-chymi'a, Chymi'a pharmaceut'ica, when it is engaged in the analysis of simple medicines; in improving the prescribing and preparing of chemical and Galenic medicines; in the means of preparing them, and detecting adulterations, &c. Hygien'ic Chym'istry is that which is applied to the means of rendering habitations healthy, of analyzing the air we breathe, preventing the occurrence of disease, pointing out healthy aliments, and appreciating the influence of professions, &c., on the health of man. All these different subdivisions, with vegetable chymistry, are, at times, included under the head of Medical Chym'istry, Phytochymistry; at others, the term comprehends only the Animal, Vegetable and Pharmaceutical subdivisions. Vital Chemistry, Biochymi'a, is that which is exerted under the influence of vitality. Histochem'ymy, Histochemi'a, Histochem'istry, is the chemistry of the tissues, and Phlegmatochem'ymy, that of the animal humours, (Lehmann).

A knowledge of chemistry is of great importance to the physician. Many of the functions are of a chemical nature: many diseases require a chemical mode of treatment; and, without an acquaintance with it, two or more substances might be given in combination, which, by forming a chemical union, might give rise to other compounds, possessing very different virtues from the components taken singly, and thus the prescriber be disappointed in the results.

CIL'IA (singular Cilium), Blephar'ides, Epi-cæ'rides, Pili palpebra'rum. The eyelashes, (Sc.) Winkers. The hairs on the eyelids. (F.) Cils. Their use seems to be, to prevent the entrance into the eye of light bodies flying in the atmosphere; and to diminish, in certain cases, the intensity of light. Also, the tarsi. Also, a peculiar sort of moving organs, resembling small hairs, vi'bratory or vi'bratile cil'ia, Cil'ia vibra-toria, (F.) Cils vibratils, which are visible with the microscope in many animals. These organs are found on parts of the body which are habitually in contact with water, or other more or less fluid matters, and produce motion in these fluids, impelling them along the surface of the parts. Cilia have been found to exist in all vertebrated animals except fishes, having been discovered on the respiratory, uterine, and other membranes of mammalia, birds, and reptiles.

The terms "vibratory motion" and "ciliary motion" have been used to express the phenomena exhibited by the moving cilia; and it is probable, that this motion is concerned in the progression of fluids along the membranes. As yet, the motion has only been observed in the direction of the outlets of canals.

CILIAIRE, Ciliary.

CIL'IA'RY, Cilia'ris, (F.) Ciliaire. Relating to the eyelashes, or to cilia. This epithet has, also, been applied to different parts, which enter into the structure of the eye; from the resemblance between some of them (the ciliary processes) and the eyelashes.

CIL'IA'RY AR'TERIES, Arte'ria cilia'ris, (F.) Ar-tères ciliaires. These are furnished by the ophthalmic artery. They are distinguished into, 1. Short or posterior (Art. vésales—Chauss.) 30 or 40 in number, which are distributed to the ciliary processes. 2. Long, (Art. Iriennes of Chauss.) two in number, which, by the anastomoses of their branches, form two arterial circles at the anterior surface of the iris: and, 3. The anterior, Arte'ria cilia'ris anterior of Haller, the number of which is variable. These pierce the sclerotic a few lines from its union with the cornea; and are principally distributed to the iris.

CIL'IA'RY BODY, Corpus Cilia'rè, Nexus Stamin'eus Oculi, Coro'na Cilia'ris, Ciliary Disc, (F.) Corps ciliaire. A ring of the choroid surrounding the crystalline in the manner of a crown; placed behind the iris and the ciliary circle. It resembles the disk of a radiated flower, and is formed by the union of the ciliary processes. See Ciliary Muscle.

CIL'IA'RY CANAL, Canal of Fonta'na. A small, extremely narrow circular space, formed between the ciliary circle, the cornea, and the sclerotic. It can be filled with injection, and it is not certain that it is not the cavity of a blood-vessel.

CIL'IA'RY CIRCLE, Ciliary ligament—c. Disc, Ciliary body—c. Ganglion, Ophthalmic ganglion.

CIL'IA'RY LIG'AMENT, C. Circle or Ring, Ligamentum seu Interstit'ium cilia'rè seu Iridis, Plexus cilia'ris, An'nulus seu Circulus seu Or-biculus cilia'ris, A. cellulosus, Com'missure of the Uvea, (F.) Commissure de la Chorôïde—(Ch.), Ligament ou Cercle ciliaire, Cercle de la Chorôïde, Ceinture blanche de la Chorôïde. A species of greyish ring, of a pulpy consistence, situate between the choroid, iris, and sclerotic. The internal surface of the choroid is uniform, until it approaches within ten lines and a half of the edge of the cornea; here a dentated line is observed, termed ora serra'ta. The outer surface presents the an'nulus al'bidus seu gangliiform'is, the anterior edge of which unites to the inner surface of the sclerótica and constitutes the ciliary ligament.

CILIARY or TARSAL MARGIN of the eyelids; (F.) Bord ciliaire. The edge in which the cilia or eyelashes are situate.

CILIARY MOTION, see Cilia.

CILIARY MUSCLE, Musculus ciliar'is. The part of the orbicularis palpebrarum in the vicinity of the ciliary margin. Also, the greyish, semi-transparent structure behind the ciliary ligament and covering the outside of the ciliary body. By its contraction the ciliary processes, and with them the lens, must be drawn towards the cornea. It appears to be the same muscle as the Tensor choroidææ, Pro'trahens lentis, or choroid muscle of some anatomists.

CILIARY NERVES (Nerfs Iriens,—Chauss.), (F.) Nerfs ciliaires. These are 12 to 16 in number. They arise from the nasal nerve, and particularly from the anterior part of the ophthalmic ganglion; and unite in two fasciculi, which pass around the optic nerve, and pierce the sclerótica near the entrance of that nerve into the eye. They are lost in the ciliary ligament.

CILIARY PLEXUS, C. Ligament.

CILIARY PROC'ESSES, Processus seu Rad'ii seu Striæ ciliares, (F.) Process ciliaires, Rayons sous-iriens—(Ch.). Triangular folds, sixty or eighty in number, placed at the side of each other, and radiating, so as to resemble the disk of a radiated flower. They are lodged in depressions at the anterior part of the vitreous humour. The uses of these processes are not known.

CILIARY RING, Ciliary ligament.

CILIARY STRIÆ are numerous pale, radiated striæ in the posterior portion of the Corpus ciliare, but so covered by the Pigmentum nigrum as not to be distinctly seen till the paint is removed. The ciliary processes are formed by these striæ.

CILIARY VEINS, (F.) Veines ciliaires, follow nearly the same course as the arteries. In the choroid they are so tortuous, that they have received the name Vasa cortico'sa. They open into the ophthalmic vein.

CILIARY ZONE, Zona seu Zo'nula seu Lam'ina Ciliar'is, Membran'ula Coro'næ Ciliar'is. Under the corpus ciliare, the capsule of the vitreous humour sends off an external lamina, which accompanies the retina, and is inserted, with it, into the forepart of the capsule of the lens, a little before its anterior edge. This is the Zonula ciliaris, Zonula Zin'nii or Zonula of Zinn, Coro'næ Ciliar'is, Orbic'ulus Ciliar'is. It is of a striated appearance and circular form, and assists in fixing the lens to the vitreous humour.

CIL'IATED, Cilia'tus, (F.) Cilié, from cilia. Provided with cilia—as "ciliated epithelium," the epithelium to which vibratory cilia are attached.

CILIUM, see Cilia.

CILLEMENT, Nictation.

CILLO. A name given by some authors to those whose upper eyelid is perpetually tremulous;—a trembling, which in some cases is called Life's blood. "To have life's blood in the eye," in other words, is to have this affection. Vogel calls it Cillo'sis.

CILLOSIS, Cillo.

CILS, Cilia—c. Vibratils, see Cilia.

CIMEX, C. lectular'ius, Acan'thia lectular'ia, Koris, kops. The Bug; Wall, House or Bed Bug or Chinche. (F.) Punaise. Six or seven of these, given internally, are said to have prevented ague! There is scarcely anything which is sufficiently disgusting, that has not been exhibited for this purpose, and with more or less success. The bug has also been esteemed emmenagogue.

CIMICIFUGA, Actæa racemosa.

CIMO'LIA PURPURES'CENS, Terra Saponaria seu Fullon'ica, Fuller's Earth. A compact bolar earth, employed in the arts. Used at times as a cooling application to inflamed nipples, &c.

CIMO'LIA TERRA, Cimo'lia alba, Cimo'lus, Smectis, Smectris; from Κίμωνος, an island in the Cretan Sea, where it is procured. It was formerly used as an astringent, &c.—Scribonius Largus, Pliny. Probably, the same as the last.

CINCHO'NA. So called from the Spanish Viceroy's lady, the Countess de Cinchon, who was cured of fever by it at Lima, about 1638. Called also Cortex seu Pulvis Jesu'ic'us, Jesu'it's Bark or Powder, Cortex Patrum, because it was introduced into Europe by the Jesuits; also Pulvis Comitissæ or the Countess's Powder, and Cardinal del Lugo's Powder, Cortex Cardinal'is de Lugo, because he introduced it at Rome; and in France, Talbor's Powder and English remedy, because successfully used there by Sir Robert Talbor, who kept it a secret. It is the pharmacopœial name of several kinds of barks from various species of Cinchona, from the western coast of South America. Order, Cinchonaceæ. Sex. Syst. Pentandria Monogynia. Called, also, Cortex, Bark, Peruvian Bark, Cortex Chinæ seu China, Chinch'ina, Palos de Calentura, Kina Kina, (Bark of Barks,) Kinki'na, Cina Cina, Quina Quina, Quinqu'ina, Magnum Dei donum, (F.) Quinquina; and in Peru Cascara and Cascarilla. CINCHO'NÆ CARIBÆÆ CORTEX, from Exostem'ma Caribæ'um, Caribæ'an or Saint Lucia Bark, (F.) Ecorce de Saint Lucie, Quinquina Piton, from Exostem'ma floribundum; and the Pitaya Bark, Quinquina bi'color, from an exostema [?] or from strychnos pseudoquina [?], are useful substitutes for the cinchona of Peru. These are the most important spurious barks. They contain neither quinia nor cinchonina.

CINCHONÆ CORDIFOLLE CORTEX, Cortex flavus, Cinchonæ officinal'is cortex flavus, China re'gia seu Calisay'a, Cortex Chinæ re'gius seu flavus seu h'uteus, Yellow Royal or Calisay'a Bark, (F.) Quinquina jaune ou jaune royal, Calasaya. Odour aromatic; taste strong, bitter, astringent. Not rolled; often without the epidermis, which is very thick and inert; light, friable; fracture fibrous. Active principle Quinia. The false or spurious Calisaya barks are those of Cinchonâ

Calisaya, variety Josephiana; C. Boliviana, C. ovata, variety rufinervis, called, in Peru, Cascarilla Carabaya—the Carabaya bark of commerce;—of C. scrobiculata, two varieties, Cusco bark and Bark of St. Ann; of C. pubescens, which furnishes the Cusco or Arica bark; of C. micrantha and of C. amygdalifolia.

CINCHONÆ LANCIFOLIE CORTEX, Cortex Peruvia'nus seu pallidus, Cinchonæ officinalis cortex commutis, Cinchona pallida, Pale, Loxa or Crown Bark, (F.) Quinquina gris de Loxa, Quinquina Orange. Its odour is aromatic; taste pleasant, bitter, and astringent. The pieces are rolled in double or single quills. Epidermis brown, cracked; fracture resinous. Internally of a cinnamon colour. Its active principle is Cinchonia.

CINCHONÆ OBLONGIFOLIE CORTEX, Cortex ruber, Cinchonæ officinalis cortex ruber, Red Bark, (F.) Quinquina rouge, (Sp.) Cascarilla roza and C. colorada, of S. America. Odour and taste the same as the pale, but more intense: in large flat pieces, solid, heavy, dry; fracture short and smooth; of a deep brownish-red colour. Although this variety of bark is assigned to the Cinchona oblongifolia by some, it would seem, that nothing is certainly known as to its source. Active principles, Cinchonia and Quinia.

The last three are the only official varieties in the Pharmacopœia of the United States. There are many other varieties, however, which are genuine cinchona barks, and yet have not been considered worthy of an official position. The Edinburgh Pharmacopœia admits, indeed, Cinchona cinerea, Grey bark, Silver bark or Huanuco or Lima bark, which is obtained around Huanuco in Peru, and, with the Jaen or Ash bark and the Huamiles bark, belongs to the class of pale or Loxa barks. Amongst the genuine but inferior barks are those brought from the northern Atlantic ports of South America, which, in commerce, are variously called Pitaya, Bogota, Carthagena, Maracaybo, and Santa Martha barks. The Bogota is also called Fusa gasuga and Coquetta bark.

All these barks are bitter, astringent, tonic, and eminently febrifuge. The yellow bark has been thought equal to any of the others, but the red contains more active principle. The discovery of their active principles is one of the most important gifts of modern chemistry. Still, in pernicious intermittents, the bark, in substance, is often demanded. It is employed in every disease in which there is deficient tone; but in cases where the stomach is much debilitated, the powder had better be avoided, in consequence of the woody fibre, which might disagree. Externally, it is used in enemata, gargles, &c., and in gangrenous ulcerations. When it excites nausea, an aromatic may be added to it; if purging, opium; if costiveness, rhubarb, &c. Dose, ʒss to ʒj or more.

ESSENTIAL SALT OF BARK, as it is called, is an extract, prepared by macerating the bruised substance of bark in cold water, and submitting the infusion to a very slow evaporation.

CINCHONIA, Cinchonine—c. Tannate of, Quinia et cinchoninæ tannas.

CINCHON'ICINE, Cinchonici'na, Cinchonic'ia. When a salt of cinchonia is exposed to heat, with certain precautions, the alkaloid is changed into another, isomeric with itself, to which this name has been given. Cinchonine, and its sulphate, possess the same medical properties as cinchonia and its salts. Dose, gr. v. to gr. xv.

CINCH'ONINE, Cinchoni'na, Cinch'onin, Cincho'nia. The active principle of Cinchona lancifolia. An organic, crystalline alkali; of a white colour, and bitter, slightly astringent taste; very soluble in alcohol and ether, but almost insoluble in water.

Sulphate of Cinchonia, which is formed directly from cinchonia, is soluble in water and alcohol. The action of the sulphate of cinchonia is similar to that of the sulphate of quinia; but it is less energetic, and consequently requires to be given in a larger dose.

Physiologists give this name to the motion of the blood through the different vessels of the body—sanguimotion; — to that function, by which the blood, setting out from the left ventricle of the heart, is distributed to every part of the body by the arteries; — proceeds into the veins, returns to the heart, enters the right auricle, and passes into the corresponding ventricle, which sends it into the pulmonary artery to be distributed to the lungs, whence it issues by the pulmonary veins, and passes into the left auricle. From this it is sent into the left ventricle, and is again distributed by means of the arteries.

It consists in removing circularly a portion of the prepuce of infants; — a custom, which was probably suggested with a view to cleanliness. In cases of extraordinary length of prepuce, or when affected with disease, the operation is sometimes undertaken by surgeons. The juice, Succus Limo'nis, Limo'num Succus (Ph. L.), (F.) Suc du Limon, Suc de Citron, is sharp, but gratefully acid, the acidity depending upon the citric acid it contains, and is given as a refrigerant beverage in febrile affections. In doses of half an ounce to an ounce, three times a day, it has appeared to exert a markedly sedative influence on the circulation, and has been given, apparently with benefit, in acute rheumatism and rheumatic gout. Alone, or combined with wine, it is prescribed in scurvy, putrid sore throat, &c. Its general properties are refrigerant and antiseptic. Sweetened and diluted, it forms Lemonade. Artificial lemon-juice is made by dissolving an ounce of citric acid in fourteen fluidounces of water; adding a few drops of essence of lemon.

Lemonpeel tea, or water, is made by paring the rind of one lemon, previously rubbed with half an ounce of sugar: the peelings and sugar are then put into a jar, and a quart of boiling water is poured over them. When cold, the fluid must be poured off, and a tablespoonful of lemon juice be added.

It is an agreeable drink in fevers.

CLIFTON, CLIMATE OF. The vicinity of Clifton and of Bristol, England, appears to be the mildest and driest climate in the west of England; and, consequently, the best winter residence, in that part of the country, for invalids. It is, also, a favorable summer climate, and is surrounded by numerous places of agreeable resort, suited for those who may pass the season there.

For the mineral waters of Clifton, see Bristol Hot Well.

CLIGNEMENT, Scardamylgus.

CLIGNOTEMENT, Nictation.

CLIMA, Climate.

CLIMACTERIC, Climacter'icus, Climacter'icus, from κλιμακτηρ, 'a step.' (F.) Climactérique ou Climatérique. A word, which properly signifies 'by degrees.' It has been applied to certain times of life, regarded to be critical.

At present, the word Climacteric is chiefly applied to certain periods of life, at which great changes occur, independently of any numerical estimate of years. Such are the period of puberty in both sexes; that of the cessation of the menses in women, &c.

CLIMACTERIC YEARS, Anni Climacter'ici, are, according to some, all those in the life of man, which are multiples of the number 7, Septenniads. Others have applied the term to years, resulting from the multiplication of 7 by an odd number. Some have admitted only three climacterics; others, again, have extended them to multiples of 9. Most, however, have considered the 63d year as the Grand Climacteric;—63 being the product of the multiplication of 7 by 9, and all have thought that the period of three, seven, or nine, which they respectively adopted, was necessary to the entire renewal of the body; so that there was, at these times, in the economy, none of the parts of which it had previously consisted. The climacteric years have also been called, (Anni hebdomad'ici, scalares, gradarii, scan'siles, genethliaci, natali'ii, futales, crit'ici, decretorii, hero'ici, &c. All the notions on the subject are essentially allied to the doctrine of numbers of Pythagoras.

CLIMATAL, Climate.

CLIMATE, Clima, Inclinatio cæli, (F.) Climat, Gr. κλιμα, 'a region.' In geography, the word climate is applied to a space on the terrestrial globe, comprised between two circles parallel to the equator, and arbitrarily measured according to the length of the days. In a hygienic point of view, we understand by climate, since Hippocrates, a country or region, which may differ from another in respect to season, qualities of the soil, heat of atmosphere, &c. Climate, indeed, embraces, in a general manner, all the physical circumstances belonging to each region,—circumstances which exert considerable influence on living beings. The dark complexion of the inhabitants of the torrid zone is easily distinguishable from the paleness of those of the frigid,—so are the diseases. They are all modified, more or less, by climate or locality. Hot climates predispose to abdominal complications in febrile affections; cold climates to thoracic, &c.

One of the most important considerations with regard to climates is their comparative fitness for the residence of invalids, and especially of those who are liable to, or suffering under, catarrhal or consumptive affections. The great object, in such cases, is to select a climate which will admit of regular and daily exercise in the open air, so that the invalid may derive every advantage which this form of revulsion is capable of effecting. To an inhabitant of the northern and middle portions of the United States—and the same applies to Great Britain, France, and the northern parts of the old world—a more southern climate alone affords these advantages in an eminent degree. During the summer months there are few, if any, diseases, which require a milder climate than that of the United States, or of the milder districts of Europe. The temperature of the winter months is, consequently, the most important object of attention. Equability of temperature is essential, inasmuch as all sudden changes interfere with the great desideratum—exercise in the open air. In the whole continent of North America the changes are very sudden and extensive. It is not uncommon for the range to be 40°, between two successive days. So far, therefore, as this applies, the American climate is not well adapted to the invalid. In the southern portions, however, of the Union, this objection is counterbalanced by many advantages.

The following tables exhibit the mean temperature of the year, and of the different seasons—with the mean temperature of the warmest and coldest months at different places in America, Europe, Africa, &c., as deduced from the excellent paper of Von Humboldt on Isothermal Lines, the Meteorological Registers kept by the surgeons of the United States army, under the direction of Surgeon-generals Lovell and Lawson, 1822 to 1854, inclusive, the work of Sir James Clark on Climate, &c.

Certain of the tables show the mean monthly temperature, maximum, minimum and range, as well as the greatest daily, and mean daily range during the corresponding months—but of different years—at some of the prominent retreats for the valetudinarian in Great Britain, on the continent of Europe, and in the African islands. It is proper, however, to remark, that in no situations, except in those to which an asterisk is affixed, was the register thermometer used. In the others, the observations were made during the day only, and consequently the numbers given are far below the real range throughout the twenty-four hours. The places are ranged in the order of their mean temperature.

In the United States, the most favourable region for the phthisical invalid is that of Florida, especially of Pensacola. St. Augustine is frequently chosen, but it is liable to north-east storms, which interfere with the out-door movements of the valetudinarian, and are the source of much discomfort. Still, great benefit has often been derived from it as a winter retreat. Of the Atlantic Isles, Madeira appears to be best adapted for the consumptive, and those affected with chronic bronchitis. In Italy, Rome, and Pisa, and in England, Torquay and Undercliff, are to be preferred. Chronic rheumatism and gout are benefited by a warm climate, which, again, is unfavourable to those who are predisposed to cerebral diseases, especially to such as are characterized by debility and mobility of the nervous system—as paralysis, epilepsy, mania, &c. Hypochondriasis and dyspepsia require rather change of climate and travelling exercise than a sojourn in any one. (See the Author's Human Health, Philad., 1844).

For the mortality of different countries and cities, see Mortality.

COCO-OLEIN, see Cocos nucifera.

COCOS BUTYR'CEA. The name of the plant which affords the palm oil, O'leum pal'mæ, obtained chiefly from the fruit, by bruising and mixing the kernels with water, without the aid of heat, by which the oil is separated and rises to the surface. It is of the consistence of an ointment, with little taste, and a strong, though not disagreeable, smell. It is applied to sprains, &c.; but has no advantages over other oils. It has been used as the excipient for suppositories, and has been called, also, O'leum Palmæ sebæ'ceum, O. fix'um nuceum cocos butyr'ceæ and Mackaw fat. It is procured likewise from the Ela'is Guineen'sis, and Ela'is Occidentalis, two species of palms. Cocos is said to be contracted from (P.) maccoco or maccaco, 'a monkey,' the three holes at the end of the cocoa-nut shell causing it to resemble somewhat a monkey's head.

COCOS NUCIF'ERA, Palma cocos, (F.) Cocotier. Order, Palmæ. The systematic name of the plant whose fruit is the cocoa-nut. (F.) Coco. It is an agreeable kernel, but not easy of digestion. Emulsions, orgeat, &c., are made from it. The juice of the cocoa, Toddy, when fermented, forms wine, and arrack is distilled from it. The expressed oil—Coco-olein—has been found almost as efficacious as cod-liver oil in tuberculosus.

With the ancients, coct'ion meant the particular kind of alteration which the food experiences in the digestive organs, particularly in the stomach. It meant a preparation from its crude state. 2. It expressed the maturation or change, which the humoral pathologists believed morbid matter experiences before elimination. It was considered, that coction, Coct'io morbi, was produced during the violence of the disease; and hence this was called the Period of Coct'ion. See Humorism.

COFFEA ARAB'ICA, C. vulgar'is, Jas'minum Arab'icum, (F.) Cafier, Caféier, and Caféyer. Order, Rubiaceæ. Sec. Syst. Pentandria Monogynia. The plant which affords coffee, Choava, Bon, Buna, (F.) Café. Originally from Yemen.

The infusion of coffee is an agreeable and wholesome article of diet. It is, to a certain extent, a tonic, and is employed as such in convalescence, especially from fevers, &c. In cases of poisoning by opium, and in old asthmas, its use has been extolled. For this purpose the Moka is the best. It ought to be newly torrefied, but not too much burnt; should be strong, and drunk soon after grinding.

A highly azoted alkaloid was first found in coffee, and called Cafein or Caffein. It was afterwards discovered in the leaves of the tea plant, and called Thein, and in the Guarana of Brazil, and called Guaranin. In doses of from 2 to 10 grains, it induces violent nervous and vascular excitement. Caffein—as well as its various salts—the citrate, lactate, malate, and muriate, have been given as an antiperiodic in grain doses.

Factitious Coffees have been, from time to time, recommended, but they are infinitely inferior to the genuine. Various substitutes have been proposed; wheat, barley, hollyberries, acorns, sunflower seeds, beech-mast, peas, beans, succory-root, seeds of goosberries and currants left in making wine, and washed,—sliced turnips, &c. These have been roasted, with the addition of a little butter or oil; but they have not the aroma of coffee. The best substitute is said to be the seeds of the Yellow water flag, Gladiolus luteus or Iris pseudacorus.

Hunt's Economical Breakfast Powder consisted of rye, roasted with a little butter.

All proceed towards the colon, passing between the two laminæ of the peritoneum, which form the mesocolon, where they ramify and anastomose with each other. The first, Colica dextra, Ramus colicæ dexter, is called C. dextra superior, (Meso-colique, — Ch.) The second, C. dextra media, Colica media, Ramus colicæ medius, Arteria media anastomat'ica, (C. droite, Ch.,) and the third, C. dextra inferior or Ileo-colica, (A. cæcale, — Ch.) Of the three Colicæ sinist'rae, the first or superior is called, by Chaussier, Colica magna sinist'ra; the second or media is not distinguished from the preceding, as they often arise from a common trunk; and the third is called by Chaussier Colica parva sinist'ra. Under this head is generally described the colic produced by lead, as well as the other colics mentioned in the synonymy; and they certainly resemble each other greatly, although some of them are more like bilious colic. There is not much to distinguish this variety of colic from others. The same violent pain about the navel is present, with retraction of the abdomen towards the spine. It is apt also to occasion palsy. The only difference of treatment is in the necessity for employing more opium along with the purgative. The paralytic sequelæ must be treated by change of air, rubbing the spine, exercise, &c. Treating the disease upon general principles is infinitely more philosophical, and more successful than the former empirical management at La Charité, Paris, which it is unnecessary to detail.

The Colic of Madrid, Poitou, Devonshire, Normandy, &c., has been called vegetable colic, (F.) Colique végétale, because ascribed to the use of new wine or cider, unripe fruit, &c., although really, perhaps, owing to the adulteration of wines and cider by litharge. All the symptoms, indeed, are those of Colica metallica.

When applied to a part, the ether evaporates, and the solid adhesive material is left, which contracts. Hence it is used in cases of wounds, to keep their edges together. It forms, also, a coating, and has been applied in abrasions, and in cases of burns. In various chronic cutaneous diseases, it has been applied with advantage; and has been employed to give a coating to pills, which it deprives of their taste, without interfering with their action.

(F.) Béton. The first milk after accouchement. It contains more serum and butter, and less casein than common milk, and seems to possess an evacuant property, which renders it fit to aid in the expulsion of the meconium. Colostrum formerly meant an emulsion prepared of turpentine and yolk of egg.

COLOUR-BLINDNESS, Achromatopsia.

COLOURS, ACCIDENTAL, Opposite colours, Complementary or Harmonic colours, (F.) Couleurs Complémentaires. If the eye has been for some time regarding a particular colour, the retina becomes insensible to this colour; and if, afterwards, it be turned to a sheet of white paper, the paper will not seem to be white, but will be of the colour that arises from the union of all the rays of the solar spectrum, except the one to which the retina has become insensible. Thus, if the eye be directed for some time to a red wafer, the sheet of paper will seem to be of a bluish-green, in a circular spot of the same dimensions as the wafer. This bluish-green image is called an ocular spectrum, because it is impressed upon the eye and may be retained for a short time; and the colour bluish-green, is said to be the accidental colour of the red. If this experiment be made with wafers of different colours, other accidental colours will be observed, varying with the colour of the wafer employed, as in the following table:—

Colour of the Wafer.	Accidental colour, or colour of the ocular spectrum.
Red	Bluish green.
Orange	Blue.
Yellow	Indigo.
Green	Violet with a little red.
Blue	Orange red.
Indigo	Orange yellow.
Violet	Yellow green.
Black	White.
White	Black.

If all the colours of the spectrum be ranged in a circle, in the proportions they hold in the spectrum itself, the accidental colour of any particular colour will be found directly opposite. Hence, the two colours have been termed opposite colours. It will follow from what has been said, that if the primary colour, or that to which the eye has been first directed, be added to the accidental colour, the result must be the same impression as that produced by the union of all the rays of the spectrum — white light. The accidental colour, in other words, is what the primitive colour requires to make it white light. The primitive and accidental colours are, therefore, complements of each other; and hence accidental colours have also been called complementary colours. They have likewise been termed harmonic, because the primitive and its accidental colour harmonize with each other in painting.

COMPLEXIO, Coition, Complexio, Confusio, Temperament.

COMPLEXION, Complexio. Often employed, in English, for the colour of the face, as "He has a good complexion,"—a "sallow complexion," &c. It formerly had a more extensive signification, and still has in France. It signifies the aggregate of physical characters presented by any individual, considered with respect to his external arrangement or condition. It means more than constitution, for which it is used synonymously in many cases; and differs from temperament, which is less the external condition of the body than the state or disposition of the organs in health.—H. Cloquet.

COMPRESSIF, Compressive.

COMPRESSIO, Compression, Thlipsis.

COMPRESS'ION, Compressio, Energetis. Same etymology. Pressure; methodical compression. An agent frequently had recourse to in surgery. We compress a limb, affected with œdema, varices, hydrops articuli, callous ulcer, &c. The abdomen is compressed after delivery, after paracentesis abdominis, &c. The compression is produced by means of the roller, laced stocking, &c., according to the part, and to the particular case. Moderate pressure aids the contractility of parts, and excites the action of the absorbents; so that large tumours at times disappear after it has been used for some time. A greater degree of pressure occasions, still more, the emaciation of the part, but it is apt to impede the circulation. Pressure is often used to stop or moderate the flow of blood in cases of aneurism or wounds of arteries and veins. In such cases, the compression may be immediate, when applied upon the artery itself, or it may be mediate, when applied through the integuments and soft parts. The French use the term Compression immédiate latérale for that which is exerted perpendicularly to the axis of a vessel, so as to flatten its sides. It is practised with the finger, forceps, tourniquet, compresses, &c.

COMPRES'SION OF THE BRAIN. This may arise either from coagula of blood, a soft tumour, a bony excrescence, a depressed portion of the skull, or the presence of some foreign body. The effects vary, according as the compression takes place suddenly or gradually. When suddenly, the symptoms are of the comatose or apoplectic character. When gradually, mania, convulsions, &c., are more likely to occur. Compression, arising from a depressed portion of skull, requires the use of the trephine.

COMPRES'SIVE, Compressivus, (F.) Compressif. That which compresses. A compressive bandage is one that compresses the parts to which it is applied.

COMPRES'SOR OR COMPRESSORIUM OF DUPUYTREN, (F.) Compresseur de Dupuytren. An instrument for compressing the femoral artery, invented by Dupuytren. It is constructed on the same principles as the tourniquet of J. L. Petit, from which it only differs in this respect; — that, instead of being maintained in its place by a strap, which always compresses more or less the circumference of the limb, the two pads are placed at the extremities of a semicircle of steel, which, by passing from one to the other without touching the parts, limits the pressure to two opposite points of the thigh, and permits the collateral circulation to go on.

COMPRESSOR NASI, Rinæus, Nasalis, Transversalis Nasi, Myrtiformis, Dilatatores alarum nasi, Constrictor Nasi seu Narium seu Naris, Triangularis Nasi, (F.) Maxillo-narial, Susmaxillo-nasal, — (Ch.) Compresseur du nez, Transversal du nez. It arises from the inner part of the fossa canina, and passes to the dorsum of the nose; where it is confounded with that of the opposite side.

COMPRES'SOR URE'THÆ. A muscle consisting of two portions — one of which is transverse in its direction, and, in consequence of its having been particularly described by Mr. Guthrie, has been called Guthrie's muscle. It arises from the ramus of the ischium, and passes inwards to embrace the membranous urethra. The other portion is perpendicular, descending from the pubis and passing down to be inserted into the transverse portion of the muscle; — Pubio-urethralis. This portion has been considered by many to be only the anterior fibres of the levator ani; and having been described by Mr. Wilson, it has been called Wilson's muscle.

COMPRESSOR VENE DORSALIS PENIS. A small muscle, distinctly seen in animals, less distinctly in man, which arises from the ramus of the pubis, and ascending in a direction forwards is inserted above the vena dorsalis, joining with its fellow of the opposite side on the mesial line. Its use is supposed to compress the vein in erection. It is sometimes called the muscle of Houston, after Dr. Houston of Dublin.

CONCEPTIO, Concept'io, Concept'us, Cye'sis, Syllep'sis, Androlep'sia, from concep'tio, (com and capio,) 'I conceive.' The impregnation of the ovum by the positive contact of the male sperm, whence results a new being. The whole subject of conception is most mysterious. It seems to occur as follows. During the sexual union, the male sperm passes along the uterus and Fallopian tubes: the fimbriated extremities of the latter seize hold of the ovarium; and the sperm in this manner comes in contact with a matured ovum, and impregnates it. The fecundated ovum remains some time in the ovarium, but at length bursts its covering, is laid hold of by the fimbriated extremity of the Fallopian tubes, and passes along the tube into the cavity of the uterus, where it remains for the full period of utero-gestation. Some are of opinion, that the ovum is not impregnated until it has entered the Fallopian tube, or uterus.

CONCEPTIO, FALSE, Falsus Concept'us, Spu'rium germen, (F.) Fausse Conception, Faux germe. An irregular, preternatural conception, the result of which is a mole or some similar production, instead of a properly organized fœtus. See Mole.

CONCEPTUS FALSUS, Conception, false.

CONCHA, Conchus, κογχη, 'a concave shell.' A liquid measure, amongst the Athenians, equal to half an ounce. Anatomists apply this term to several hollow parts of the body;—as the Concha of the Ear,—Concha Auris, Concha Auric'ulæ; (F.) Conque—the hollow part of the cartilage of the external ear. It has, also, been applied to the genital organs of the female; to the patella, &c.

The act of becoming thick or solid. It was once used synonymously with adhesion or growing together—as, "concretion of the toes." Most commonly, it is applied to extraneous and inorganic bodies, of a solid character, met with in different textures, after certain chronic inflammations; or which make their appearance in the joints or in the reservoirs for excrementitious fluids. Concretion is, therefore, frequently synonymous with Calculus, and is then rendered, in Latin, by the word Concrem'entum. But Concretion has a more extensive signification than Calculus; thus, accidental ossifications or deposits of phosphate of lime in certain organs, and especially in the liver and lungs, are properly called osseous concretions. They could not well be called osseous calculi.

In Surgery, it is used for the agitation often communicated to one organ by a fall upon another; as to the brain from a fall on the breech, &c.

In all severe injuries, in sudden encephalic hemorrhage, and in overwhelming emotions, a concussion or shock is felt to a greater or less extent in the nervous system, which requires the careful attention of the physician.

CONCUSSION OF THE BRAIN, Commo'tio Cer'e'br'i, Apoplex'ia nervosa traumatica, Encephalosis'ismus, (F.) Commo'tion du Cerveau, sometimes gives rise to alarming symptoms, even to abolition of the functions of the brain, yet without any sensible organic disease. Slight concussion of the brain, called stunning, consists in vertigo, tinnitus aurium, loss of memory, and stupefaction; all these being temporary. When more severe, there is instant loss of sensation and volition, vomiting, the patient being as if in a sound sleep, but there is no stertorous breathing. Pulse variable, generally more rapid and feeble than in compression; extremities cold. Little can be done here, till reaction has occurred: after this, the case must be treated according to general principles,—by bleeding, blisters, cold applied to the head, &c. After severe concussion, a patient, although apparently well, is not safe till some time after the accident.

CONDIMENT, Condimentum, Ar'tyma, Hedy's'ma, Condit'ura, from condire, 'to season.' (F.) Assaisonnement. Some substances are called, at times, aliments, and at others, condiments, according as they constitute the basis or the accessory to any dish: such are cream, butter, mushrooms, olives, &c. Others are always condiments, as they are only used to improve the savour of food, and contain but little nutritive matter. Such are pepper, salt, cinnamon, &c. Almost all condiments are possessed of stimulant properties.

CONDIT, Confectio.

CONDITUM, same etymon. A pharmaceutical compound of wine, honey, and some aromatics, especially pepper. Also, a confection.

CONDOM, Armour, (F.) Baudruche, Redingote Anglaise, Gant des Dames, Culotte d'assurance, Peau divine. The intestinum cœcum of a sheep, soaked for some hours in water, turned inside out, macerated again in weak, alkaline ley, changed every twelve hours, and scraped carefully to abstract the mucous membrane, leaving the peritoneal and muscular coats exposed to the vapour of burning brimstone, and afterwards washed with soap and water. It is then blown up, dried, cut to the length of seven or eight inches, and bordered at the open end with a riband. It is drawn over the penis prior to coition, to prevent venereal infection and pregnancy. It received its name from its proposer, Dr. Condom.

A kind of process, met with more particularly in the ginglymoid joints;—such as the condyles of the occipital, inferior maxillary bone, &c. Some anatomists have applied the term, however, to eminences that are not articular,—as to the lateral tuberosities at the inferior extremity of the os humeri, and even to certain depressions,—as to the concave articular surfaces at the upper extremity of the tibia. Chaussier calls the transverse root of the zygomatic process Condyle of the temporal bone.

They are four in number, seated in the occipital bone;—two anterior, and two posterior to the condyles or condyloid processes of the same bone, and to depressions, which are called Fossæ Condyloï'deæ.

As the word condyloï'dien means, 'that which has the shape of a condyle,' it has been judiciously proposed by some French anatomists that condylien should be used in preference, in the cases of the foramina and fossæ.

Physiologically, a breath, or sound produced in the larynx, which suffers more or less interruption in its passage through the vocal tube.

It may be owing either to diminished action of the muscular coat of the intestines, or to diminished secretion from the mucous membrane, or to both. Cathartics will usually remove it; after which its exciting and predisponent causes must be inquired into and obviated, to render the cure permanent.

CONSTIPATUS, Constipated.

CONSTITUTIO, Constitution, Habit of body—c. Aeris, Constitution of the atmosphere—c. Epidemica, Constitution, epidemic—c. Nervosa, Nervous diathesis.

CONSTITUTION, Constitutio, Catasitasis, Status, from con, and statuere, from stare, 'to stand.' A collection of several parts, forming a whole. In medicine, Constitution means the state of all the organs of the human body considered in regard to their special and relative arrangement, order, or activity. A good constitution is one in which every organ is well developed, and endowed with due energy, so that all perform their functions with equal facility. Any want of equilibrium in their development and energy forms a difference in the constitution. We say that a man is of a good or robust, a delicate or weak constitution, when he is commonly healthy, or commonly labouring under, or unusually susceptible of, disease.

CONSTITUTION, ARTERIAL, Plethora arteriosa.

CONSTITUTION OF THE ATMOSPHERE, Constitutio Aëris, (F.) Constitution Atmosphérique. The condition of the atmosphere, as regards dryness and humidity, temperature, heaviness, direction of the winds, &c., considered as respects its influence on the animal economy.

CONSTITUTIONAL, (F.) Constitutionnel. Belonging to the constitution of an individual; to his manner of being; as constitutional phthisis, c. gout, &c. By some, this epithet has been given to diseases, produced by the constitution of the atmosphere; but this acceptation is not common.

CONSTRICTORES PHARYNGIS, Constrictors of the Pharynx, Sphincter Gule. Muscular expansions which assist in forming the parietes of the pharynx. Three of these are generally admitted.

1. The Constrictor Pharyngis inferior, Crico-pharyngeus and Thyro-pharyngeus, (F.) Crico-thyro-pharyngien. It is broad, very thin, quadrilateral, seated superficially, extending from the thyroid and cricoid cartilages as far as the middle of the pharynx, and uniting, on the median line, with that of the opposite side. 2. The Constrictor Pharyngis Medius, Hyo-pharyngeus and Chondro-pharyngeus, Syndesmo-pharyngeus, (F.) Hyo-glossobasi-pharyngien, occupies the middle part of the pharynx. It is triangular, and attached anteriorly to the great and little cornu of the os hyoides; to the stylohyoid ligament; and terminates, posteriorly, by joining its fellow of the opposite side. 3. The Constrictor Pharyngis superior, Cephalo-pharyngeus, Glossopharyngeus, Mylo-pharyngeus, Pterygo-pharyngeus, (F.) Pterygo-syndesmo-staphylo-pharyngien, is quadrilateral, and extends from the internal ala of the pterygoid process, from the inter-maxillary ligament, from the internal oblique line of the jaw, and from the base of the tongue to the posterior part of the pharynx.

The constrictors of the pharynx contract it. They can likewise approximate the ends to each other. Chaussier considers those and the stylo-pharyngeus as but one muscle, and includes all under this last name.

CONSTRICTORES VAGINÆ, C. cunni—c. Vulvæ, C. cunni.

CONSTRINGENTIA, Astringents, Styptics.

CONSUETUDO, Habit—c. Menstrua, Menses.

CONSULTANT, Consulting physician or surgeon.

CONSULTATION, Consultatio, Deliberatio, Cœnolog'ia, Contentio, Symbolæsis, from consulere, consultum, 'to hold council.' This word has several acceptations. In English, it means, almost always, the meeting of two or more practitioners, to deliberate on any particular case of disease. In France, it signifies the written result of such deliberations, as well as the opinion of a physician, given to a patient, who consults him, either personally or by writing.

CONSULT'ING PHYSIC'IAN or SURGEON, (F.) Médecin ou Chirurgien consultant, Consultant. One who consults with the attending practitioner, regarding any case of disease. Some physicians, surgeons, and accoucheurs confine themselves to consulting practice.

CONSUMMATUM, Consummé.

CONSUMMATUS, from con, cum, 'with,' and summus, 'the whole.' Confirmed; established; developed,—as Phthisis consummata, 'confirmed consumption.'

CONSUMP'TION, from consumere, (con and sumere, sumptum), 'to waste away;' Consump'tio, Consum'tio, Syntex'is, Wasting, Wearing, (F.) Consumption. Progressive emaciation or wasting away. This condition precedes death in the greater part of chronic diseases, and particularly in phthisis pulmonalis: on this account it is, that phthisis has received the name consumption—See Phthisis. Fièvre de Consumption, Consumptive fever, is the same as Hectic fever.

CONSUMPTION OF THE BOWELS, Enterophthisis.

CONSUMPTION, GAL'LOPING, Phthisis acuta, (F.) Pthisis galopante ou aiguë. Phthisis pulmonalis, which rapidly runs through its course to a fatal termination.

CONSUMPTIVE, Phthisicus.

CONSUMTIO, Consumption.

CONTABESCEN'TIA, from contabescere, (con and tabescere), 'to grow lean.' Consumption, marasmus, atrophy, &c.

CONTACT, Contactus, from con and tangere, tactum, 'to touch.' The state of two bodies that touch each other. In the theory of contagious diseases, we distinguish immediate or direct contact, as when we touch a patient labouring under one of those diseases; and mediate or indirect contact, when we touch, not the patient himself, but objects that have touched or emanated from him. The air is, most commonly, the medium by which this last kind of contact is effected.

CONTA'GION, Contagio, Contages, Contagium, Aporrhœ'a, Apoc'rysis. Same etymon. The transmission of a disease from one person to another by direct or indirect contact. The term has, also, been applied, by some, to the action of miasmata arising from dead animal or vegetable matter, bogs, fens, &c., but in this sense it is now abandoned. Contagious diseases are produced either by a virus, capable of causing them by inoculation, as in small-pox, cow-pox, hydrophobia, syphilis, &c., or by miasmata, proceeding from a sick individual, as in plague, typhus gravior, and in measles and scarlatina. [?] Scrofula, phthisis pulmonalis, and cancer, have, by some, been esteemed contagious, but apparently without foundation. Physicians are, indeed, by no means unanimous in deciding what diseases are contagious, and what not. The contagion of plague and typhus, especially of the latter, is denied by many. It seems probable, that a disease may be contagious under certain circumstances and not under others. A case of common fever, arising from common causes, as from cold, if the patient be kept in a close, foul situation, may be converted into a disease, capable of producing emanations, which may excite a similar disease in those exposed to them. Contagion and infection are generally esteemed synonymous. Frequently, however, the former is applied to diseases not produced by contact; as measles, scarlet fever, [?] &c., whilst infection, (Prov.) Smit, is used for those that require positive contact; as itch, syphilis, &c., and conversely. Diseases, which cannot be produced in any other way than by contagion, are said to have their origin in specific contagion; as small-pox, cow-pox, measles, hydrophobia, syphilis, &c. Those which are produced by contagion, and yet are supposed to be sometimes owing to other causes, are said to arise from common contagion; as typhus, cynanche parotidæa, &c.

CONTA'GIONIST, (F.) Contagioniste. One who believes in the contagious character of a particular disease,—as of yellow fever.

CONTA'GIOUS, Contagiosus, (F.) Contagieux. Capable of being transmitted by mediate or immediate contact, Communicable,—as a contagious disease, contagious fever, contagious effluvia, &c. Commonly, the epithet infectious, (Prov.) Taking, Smittle, Catching, is applied to those that are communicated by immediate contact, as itch, syphilis, &c.

CONTAGIUM, Contagion, Miasm.

CONTEMPLABLES DIES, Critical days.

CONTEMPLATIF, (F.) Contemplatifus, (con and templum). Appertaining to contemplation. The predominant idea of the melancholic—of the monomaniac—is sometimes called contemplative.

CONTINENS, Continent.

CONTINENT, Continens. Restrained. This word is synonymous, also, with Continued; (F.) Continu.

CONTINENT CAUSE, Causa conjuncta, is a cause, real or presumed, which having given rise to a disease, continues to act during the whole of its duration. It may be considered synonymous with proximate cause. A continent fever, Febris continens, is one which preserves during its whole course, the same degree of intensity, without any remission or sensible exacerbation. A disease which continues uninterrupted, has been also called Æipathê'a, Aeiopathê'a or Æipathî'a.

CONTINENTIA, Continece.

CONTINUED FEVER, Febris continua seu continens seu anabat'ica seu assid'ua. A fever which presents no interruption in its course. Continued fevers form a division in the class Pyrexia of Cullen, and include three genera,—Synocha, Synochus, and Typhus. It is proper to remark, that some of the older writers make a distinction between the continual fever, εὐεργς, febris continua, and the synochus or febris continens. Thus, Rhases states that the synochus or continens is a fever, which consists of one paroxysm from beginning to end; whilst the continua is allied to intermittents.

CONTINUITY, Continuitas. An adhesion of two things between each other, so that they cannot be separated without fracture or laceration.

CONTINUITY, DIARTHROSES OF, (F.) Diarthroses de Continuité, are movable joints, in which the bones are continuous, but do not touch immediately, there being between them a ligamentous substance, whose flexibility permits motion. The vertebral articulations are examples of this. DIARTHROSES OF CONTIGUITY, Diarthroses de Contiguité, on the other hand, are movable articulations, in which the bones are not continuous, but touch by surfaces covered with a cartilaginous layer, which is always moistened by synovia.

CONTINUITY, LESION OF, see Continuity, Solution of.

CONTINUITY, SOLUTION OF, Solutio continui, is any division of parts, previously continuous. Wounds and fractures are solutions of continuity. The word Continuity is opposed to Contiguity: the latter meaning the condition of two things which are near each other, or touch without uniting. There is contiguity between the head of the humerus and the glenoid cavity of the scapula, but not continuity.

A lesion of continuity, Læsio continui, is a destruction of continuity caused by disease.

CONTONDANT, Contundens.

CONTRAAPERTURA, from contra, 'against,' and aperio, 'I open.' A counter-opening; Contra-incisio, Incisio priori opposita, (F.) Contre-ouverture. An incision, made in the most depending part of a wound or abscess, when the first opening is not situate in a manner favourable for the discharge of the pus.

CONTRACTILITY, Contractilitas: same etymon; (F.) Contractilité. That vital property, which gives, to certain parts, the power of contracting. The muscles of locomotion are endowed with a power of voluntary contractility, or one dependent immediately on the action of the brain:—the muscles of the viscera of digestion, and other internal organs, enjoy an involuntary contractility. Contractility and irritability are frequently used synonymously to signify the property possessed by any tissue of contracting on the application of an appropriate stimulus.

CONTRACTILITY, Irritability.

CONTRACTIO, Contraction—c. Cordis, Systole.

CONTRACTION, Contractio. Same etymon; Systole. Action of contracting. When we speak of the contraction of a muscle, we mean the phenomenon it exhibits during the time it is in action.

CONTRACTOR UTERI, Abortive.

CONTRACTURA. Same etymon. Acamp'sia, Ente'sia articuldris, Rigor artuum, Muscular Stiff-joint, (F.) Contracture. A state of permanent rigidity and progressive atrophy of the flexor muscles, which prevents the motions of extension beyond a certain limit. The affected muscles form hard cords beneath the skin. On dissection, they are found converted into tendinous fibres, the fleshy fibres having almost disappeared, when the disease has been of any duration. It succeeds, frequently, other diseases, particularly rheumatism, neuralgia, convulsions, syphilis, colica pictonum, &c. The warm bath, vapour bath, or thermal waters, oleaginous embrocations, mechanical extension of the limbs, &c., are the chief means of treatment.

CONTRAFISSURA, from contra, 'against,' and findere, fissum, 'to cleave;' Repercussio, Resonitus, Catag'ma Fissura contrajacens, Apeche'ma, Anticom'ma, Anti'opè, Antierusis, Anticrus'ma, Infortunium, Counterstroke, (F.) Contre-coup, Contre-fente, Contre-fracture. A fracture, contusion, or injury, produced, by a blow, in a part distant from that which is struck. Five species of contrafissuræ or contre-coups may occur in the skull. 1. When the internal table yields and fractures. 2. When the bone breaks in any other part than the one struck. 3. When a bone, which has been struck, remains uninjured, and its neighbour is fractured. 4. When the bone is fractured in a place diametrically opposite to that struck, as in fractures at the base of the cranium, from a fall on the vertex; and lastly, when the violence of the blow produces a separation of the neighbouring or distant sutures. These fractures of the skull are also called Fractures par résonance.

CONTROSTIMULANT, Contrastimulans, Hyposthen'ic, from contra, 'against,' and stimulus, 'that which excites.' A substance that possesses a particular, debilitating property, acting upon the excitability in a manner opposite to stimulus. A name given to therapeutical agents, which, according to the Italian theory of contro-stimulus, are endowed with the property of diminishing excitement by a specific action. These agents are by no means clearly defined.

CONTROSTIMULUS, or CONTRESTIMULUS, DOCTRINE OF, (F.) Contrestimulisme. Same etymon. The name given by Rasori, about thirty years ago, to a new medical doctrine, of which he was the originator—La nuova Dottrina Medica Italiana. It is founded on the contro-stimulant property attributed to a certain number of medicines. In this doctrine, as in that of Brown, under the name excitability, a fundamental principle of physiology is admitted, by virtue of which living beings are endowed with an aptitude for feeling the action of external agents or exciting influences, and of reacting on these influences. When this excitability is too great, there is excess of stimulus or Hypersthenia: when too little, there is deficiency or Hypothenia. Diseases, general and local, are divided into three great classes, or into, 1. Hypersthenic; 2. Hypothenic; 3. Irritative. The contro-stimulant physicians admit only two classes of medicines—stimulants and contro-stimulants.

CONTUND'ING, Contu'sing, Contun'dens, from contundere, (con and tundere, tusum), 'to bruise.' (F.) Contondant. That which causes contusions. An epithet given to round, blunt, vulnerating projectiles, which bruise or lacerate parts without cutting them.

Same etymon. An injury or lesion—arising from the impulse of a body with a blunt surface—which presents no loss of substance, and no apparent wound. If the skin be divided, the injury takes the name of contused wound. The differences of contusions, as to extent, are of course infinite. When slight, the blood stagnates in the capillaries of the skin, or is effused into the subcutaneous areolar tissue. Time and cold applications remove it. When the texture has been lacerated, there is effusion of blood, with more or less torpor in the part affected. Cooling applications, general or topical bleeding, emollients, poultices, &c., are here necessary, according to circumstances. In the severest kinds of contusion, all the soft and solid parts, except the skin, are bruised, and, at times, reduced to a kind of pap. When the disorganization is to this extent, there is no hope except in amputation. A deep contusion of the soft parts has been called Sarcoth'lasis, and Sarcoth-las'ma.

CONTUSION, WIND, see Wind of a Ball.

CONUS ARTERIO'SUS, Infundib'ulum of the heart. The portion of the right ventricle from which the pulmonary artery proceeds, forms a prominence on the right side of the anterior furrow of the heart, and is prolonged towards the left, becoming narrower at the same time, so as to form a funnel-shaped projection, which extends a little beyond the base of the ventricles. This is the Conus arteriosus.

Its odor is nauseous; taste sweetish and slightly pungent. It is solid, hard, heavy, brittle; fracture, resinous; internally, light gray; externally, covered with a deep brown, wrinkled bark. Its operation is cathartic, the resinous part griping violently. Dose, 10 gr. to ʒss. A drop or two of any essential oil may prevent it from griping. An active principle has been separated from Jalap, to which the names Jalapin and Cathartin have been given.

Some of these were called Scuteuses or Jumpers, of whom there have been examples in more recent times: others, from barking like a dog, were called aboyeuses; and others, from mewing like a cat, micaulantes.

It is the Copaifera officinalis Resinæ, Hal'samum Copaibæ seu Brazilien'se seu de Copaibâ seu Capivi, Balsam of Copaiba or Copaiva, (vulgarily pronounced capeevy,) (F.) Copahu, Baume de Copahu, B. du Brésil, Térébinthe de Copahu. Its odour is peculiar, but not unpleasant; taste pungent, bitter; consistence, syrupy; colour yellowish, and transparent. It is soluble in alcohol, ether, and the expressed oils. S. g. 0.950. Its properties are stimulant and diuretic; in large doses it is purgative. It acts on the lining membrane of the urethra, and on mucous membranes in general. It is given in gonorrhœa, gleet, leucorrhœa, &c., in the dose of grt. x to ʒj, twice or thrice a day. Should symptoms of urticaria or diarrhœa arise, the dose is too large, and must be diminished. It can be inspissated by means of magnesia so as to be made into pills, and a plan has been devised for enveloping it in gelatin, so that its taste is entirely concealed. See Capsules, gelatinous.

(F.) Corail. One of the most beautiful productions of the deep. It is fixed to submarine rocks, in the form of a shrub, and is of a bright red colour. It is the habitation of a multitude of animals, of the Zoophyta order, and is formed of a calcareous substance, secreted by the animals themselves. It is in very hard, concentric layers; covered, externally, by a species of porous bark, full of cells, each of which contains one of these animals. Linnæus calls the red coral, Isis nobilis, and M. de Lamarck, Corallium rubrum. It is much fished for on the coasts of Barbary and Sicily. Coral was formerly esteemed tonic, absorbent, astringent, &c.; but analysis has shown, that it contains only carbonate of lime and a little gelatin.—Dioscorides, Pliny, Oribasius, the Geoponica, &c. Corallium album is a hard, white, calcareous, brittle substance, the nidus of

It has the appearance of a plant, is homogeneous, an inch or two in height, of a white, reddish, or greenish colour, salt taste, and marine smell. It contains gelatin, albumen, chloride of sodium, phosphate, carbonate, and sulphate of lime, carbonate of magnesia, silica, oxide of iron, and a colouring principle. The grayish crust or buff, varying in thickness, observed on blood drawn from a vein during the existence of violent inflammation, pregnancy, &c. It is particularly manifest in pleurisy, and hence one of its names. For its production, it appears to be requisite, that there should be an increase in the proportion of the fibrinous element of the blood over that of the red corpuscles, with increased aggregation of those corpuscles. Under such circumstances, the buffy coat assumes a concave appearance on its upper surface, and the blood is, therefore, said to be cupped.

The buff is generally believed to consist of fibrin; but, according to the researches of Mulder, it is composed of a binoxide of protein, which is insoluble in boiling water, and a tritoxide which is soluble. These oxides are comprehended by him under the name oxyprotein.

When the blood presents the above appearance, it is said to be buffy.

CORN, (Saxon corn,) (G.) Kern. In England, this word means the Cerealia, or those seeds, which grow in ears, not in pods. In the United States, Corn always means Indian Corn. Its English sense corresponds to the French Blé or Bled.

CORN, Clavus, Clavus Pedis, Ephy'ma Clavus, Gemur'sa, (F.) Cor, Ognon, from cornu, 'a horn.' A small, hard, corneous tumour, which forms upon the foot, generally on the toes; and is commonly produced on the most projecting parts, by the pressure of too tight shoes. A part of the corn is raised above the skin, and forms a round tumour, like the head of a nail: the other portion, which serves as its base, is buried more or less deeply in the integuments, and occasionally extends as far as the tendons and periosteum. Corns may, sometimes, be removed, by immersing the feet in warm water, but commonly they return. They can, likewise, be destroyed by the knife or caustic, or by paring them down and pulling them out by the roots; but these operations are not always as simple as they seem. In the way of palliation, they must be constantly pared; and, for the purpose of preventing pressure, any soft plaster, spread upon linen or leather, may be applied, with a hole in the centre to receive the corn; and layer after layer of plaster be added, until they attain the level of the corn. When very irritable, the lunar caustic, rubbed over the surface, will generally diminish irritability surprisingly, and in a mode not easy of explanation.

Its surface presents two or three tubercles separated from each other by shallow grooves.

The Accessorius Pedis Hippocamp'ii, (F.) Accessoire du pied d'hippocampe, is a prominence, usually formed by the base of the inferior cornu of the lateral ventricle of the brain. It is merely a fold of the hemisphere, and was by Malacarne called Cuissart ou Armure des Jambes.

They contain about 27 per cent. of gelatin. The Shavings, Raspatura seu Ras'ura Cornu Cervi, C. C. raspatum, boiled in water, have, consequently, been esteemed emollient and nutritive.

Hartshorn Jelly may be made as follows:—Hartshorn shavings, ʒvj; boil in water Oiv to Oij; strain, and add, whilst hot, of lemon-juice, two tablespoonfuls; white sugar, ʒvj; and Sherry wine, two glasses. A good nutriment for the sick, where wine is not improper.

When burnt, the shavings constitute the Cornu cervi calcina'tum, Cornu ustum, Phosphas Calcis, Calca'ria phosphor'ica, (F.) Corne de cerf calcinée, Phosphate de chaux, which consists of 57.5 per cent. of phosphate of lime. It has been used as an antacid, but is wholly inert, as its composition would indicate. It contains only 1 per cent. of carbonate of lime.

Phosphate of lime has also been given in osteomalacia, from a presumption that the disease is owing to a deficiency of earthy matter in the blood, which is doubtless an error—the fault being in the agents of assimilation or the cells of nutrition. With as little propriety, it has been proposed as an excitant to the healthy action of the cells in tuberculosis.

Bone earth is usually sold in the shops for burnt hartshorn.

The Dublin Pharmacopœia has a Calcei phosphas præcipitata, prepared by dissolving burnt ox bones in muriatic acid, and precipitating by solution of ammonia. The dried precipitate, called bone phosphate of lime, has no virtues not possessed by the cornu ustum.

Hartshorn was once supposed to possess a bezoardic power.

CORPORA MALPIGHIA'NA, Malpighian Bodies, Ac'ini, Corpuscles or Glomerules of Malpighi, Glomeruli renales, Corpus'cula Malpighii. Scattered through the plexus formed by the blood-vessels and uriniferous tubes in the kidney, a number of small dark points may be seen with the naked eye, which received their name from Malpighi, their describer. Each of these, under the microscope, is found to consist of a convoluted mass of blood-vessels, which constitutes the true glandule, corpuscle, or glomerule of Malpighi. It was at one time supposed that the tubuli uriniferi originate in them; but this does not appear to be the case. Their use is not positively known, but as they have been traced by Mr. Bowman into the commencement of the urinary tubes, in which they lie uncovered, it has been supposed that their office may be to separate the watery portions of the blood to be mixed with the proper urinous matter.

The posterior pyramids—fasciculi grad'ciles—are described as distinct from the restiform bodies. They are situate in contact with each other, one on each side of the posterior median fissure. They become closely applied to the restiform bodies, and have been considered to be blended with them, and to proceed to form the cerebellum. According to some, they ascend to the cerebrum.

It then proceeds to the end of the corpora cavernosa, and terminates in the glans penis, which it forms. Kobelt describes, in the female, as the analogue to the corpus spongiosum of the male, a venous plexus, which, as it lies between the glans clitoridis, and the part that corresponds, in the male, to the bulb of the urethra, he terms pars intermedia, (F.) Réseau intermédiaire.

According to Müller, they disappear in man very early, so that but slight remains of them are perceptible after the 9th or 10th week of pregnancy. They cover the region of the kidneys and renal capsules, which are formed afterwards; and they are presumed to be the organs of urinary secretion during the first periods of foetal existence.

CORPUSCLES, PACINIAN, (F.) Corpuscules de Pacini, so called from Filippo Pacini, an Italian physician, who, it is generally conceived, first noticed them in 1830. They appear, however, to have been depicted in 1741 by Lehmann, from a preparation by A. Vater, who called them Papillæ and P. nervæ. Hence, it has been proposed by J. C. Strahl (1848) to call them Vaterian corpuscles or Corpuscles of Vater (Vater'sche Körperchen.) Small bodies connected with the cutaneous nerves of the palm and sole. They have also been found sparingly and inconstantly in nerves at the wrist and elbow; in the upper arm, fore-arm, and thigh, and inter-costal nerve, the sacral plexus, solar plexus and the plexuses adjacent to it. In each corpuscle there is the termination of a nervous filament. Their uses are not known.

tringent bark introduced from Brazil into Germany in 1828. It is said to be obtained from Mimosa cochlearia seu virginalis. It has been used with advantage in all cases in which astringent barks in general are indicated. Dose of the powder ℞j to ℥ss.

The gray portion observed at the exterior of the cerebrum and cerebellum; so called because it forms a kind of bark to the medullary substance. Gall considers, that this substance forms the nerves; and therefore calls it Substance matrice des Nerfs.

The name cortical is likewise given to the external substance of the kidneys, because it is of a deeper colour than the inner part of the organ, and forms a kind of envelope to it.

CORTEX OVI, Cortical membrane. This membrane, so called by Boer and Granville, is usually regarded as a uterine production, and designated Decidua reflexa. They consider it to surround the ovule, when it descends into the uterus, and to enclose the shaggy chorion. It is absorbed during the first months of utero-gestation, so as to expose the next membrane to the contact of the decidua, with which a connexion takes place at the part where the placenta is to be formed. In that part, Boer and Granville consider, that the Cortex Ovi is never altogether obliterated, but only made thinner, and in process of time is converted into a mere pellicle or envelope, which not only serves to divide the filiform vessels of the chorion into groups or cotyledons, in order to form the placenta, but also covers those cotyledons. This, Dr. Granville calls membra'na propria. See Decidua membrana.

CORTEX PALLIDUS, Cinchonae lancifoliae cortex — c. Patrum, Cinchona — c. Peruvianus, Cinchona — c. Profluvii, Nerium antidysentericum — c. Ruber, Cinchonae oblongifoliae cortex — c. Striata dentium, Enamel of the teeth — c. Thuris, Croton cascarilla — c. Winteranus, see Wintera aromatica — c. Winteranus spurius, Canella alba.

COSTA, Pleura, Pleurum, Pleuro'ma. A Rib, from custodire, 'to guard,' 'defend.' (F.) Côte old French, Coste. The ribs are 24 in number;—12 on each side. The intervals between them are called Intercostal spaces, (F.) Espaces intercostaux, and they are numbered first, second, third, &c., reckoning from above to below. They have been distinguished into Costæ veræ, Pleurapoph'yses of Owen, True ribs, (F.) Vraies Côtes, Côtes sternales, Côtes vertébro-sternales (Ch.), and into Costæ spur'riæ, Mendo'sæ seu Nothæ Costæ, False ribs, Côtes asternales (Ch.), Fausses Côtes. The true or sternal ribs, as they have also been called, are the first 7; which are articulated at one extremity to the spine, and at the other, by means of their cartilages, hæmapoph'yses of Owen, to the sternum. The false or short ribs are the remaining 5: the uppermost three being united, by means of their cartilages, to the cartilage of the last true rib. The others are free at their external extremity, and, hence, have been called Floating ribs, Costæ fluctuan'tes, (F.) Côtes flottantes. The vertebral extremity of each rib is slightly expanded. It is called the head of the rib—Capitulum Costæ: the space between this and the tubercle is the collum or neck. Anterior to the tubercle is the angle—Angulus seu Cu'bitus Costæ. Words introduced, since Gall, into medical language. The first two terms are respectively derived from κρανιον, 'cranium,' λογος, 'a discourse,' and σκοπειν, 'to examine.' They signify a description, or simply an examination, of the different parts of the external surface of the cranium, in order to deduce from thence a knowledge of the different intellectual and moral dispositions. Strictly speaking, it is by Cranioscopy that we acquire a knowledge of Craniology, Organology, or Cranology, as it has been variously termed. These words are generally, however, used in the same sense. The cranium being moulded to the brain, there are as many prominences on the bone, as there are projections at the surface of the brain. According to Gall, each projection, which he calls an organ, is the seat of a particular intellectual or moral faculty, and all persons endowed with the same faculty, have, at the same part of the brain, a prominence, which is indicated, externally, by a bump or projection in the bony case. The System of Gall is made to comprise 27 prominences, which answer to 27 faculties. The following Table exhibits these supposed organs, and their seat:

Answers to the frontal sinus, and is indicated externally by two prominences at the inner edge of the eyebrows, near the root of the nose, and outside of the organ of memory of things.

At the inner angle of the orbit.

Situate at the posterior part of the base of the two anterior lobes of the brain, on the frontal part of the bottom of the orbit, so as to make the eye prominent.

Also at the top of the orbit, between the preceding and that of the knowledge of colour.

The middle part of the eyebrows, encroaching a little on the forehead.

A little above and to one side of the last; above the outer third of the orbitar arch.

On the outside of the organ of the sense of the relation of colour, and below the last.

A round protuberance at the lateral base of the frontal bone, towards the temple, and behind the organs of music and numbers.

At the middle and anterior part of the frontal bone, above that of the memory of things.

In part confounded with the preceding. Indicated at the outer side of the last by a protuberance, which gives to the forehead a peculiar hemispherical shape.

At the lateral and outer part of the last; and giving greater width to the frontal prominence.

On the outer side of the last; divided into two halves by the coronal suture.

Indicated by an oblong prominence above the organ of comparative sagacity; almost at the frontal suture.

At the outer side of the last.

At the top of the frontal bone and at the superior angles of the parietal bone.

The top of the head; at the anterior and most elevated part of the parietal bone.

The first nineteen of these, according to Gall, are common to man and animals; the remaining eight, man possesses exclusively. They are, consequently, the attributes of humanity.

A fundamental principle with the Craniologists or Phrenologists is,—that the brain does not act as a single organ, but that it consists of a plurality of organs; but, were we able to admit this, the assignment of the seat of different faculties could not but be considered premature.

CRITICAL DAYS, Dies crit'ici seu judicatio'rii seu Decreto'rii seu Prin'cipes seu Radica'les seu Contemplab'iles seu Internu'ci, (F.) Jours critiques, are those on which a crisis, it is imagined, is most likely to happen. According to Hippocrates and Galen, the greatest number of fevers terminate favourably on the 7th day, and many on the 14th;—these two days being the most propitious. Next to these come, in order of efficiency, the 9th, 11th, 20th or 21st, 17th, 5th, 4th, 3d, 18th, 27th, and 28th. The sixth day was called by Galen, the Tyrant, τυραννος, because the crises that happened then were generally unfavourable. After this, the most unfavourable were the 8th, 10th, 12th, 16th, and 19th. The 13th was a sort of neutral day; the crises which happened on it being neither favourable nor unfavourable. Days were, also, divided into Inter'calary, on which the crises happened less frequently, and were less complete than on the critical or indicatory;—and into vacant and non-dec'retory, on which a crisis hardly ever occurred. According to this division, they were enumerated as follows:

Critical days.....7th, 14th, 20th, 27th, 34th, 40th, 60th, &c.

Indicatory days.....4th, 11th, 17th, 24th, &c.

Intercalary days.....3d, 5th, 6th, 9th, &c.

Non-decretory days..2d, 8th, 10th, 12th, 13th, &c.

Fortunate crises were considered to be indicated by favourable signs appearing three days before.

CRURÆUS, Cruralis.

CRURAL, Crura'lis, from crus, cruris, 'the thigh, and lower limb.' What belongs to the thigh or lower limb.

CRURAL ARCH, In'guinal or Fem'oral Arch, (F.) Arcade crurale on inguinale (Ch.), POU-PART'S Ligament, L. of Fallo'pius. This arch is formed by the internal portion of the inferior edge of the aponeurosis of the obliquus externus muscle, which is attached, at one end, to the pubis; at the other, to the anterior and superior spinous process of the ilium. At its posterior and inner part, the aponeurosis, forming the arch, sends off a falciform reflection, which is attached along the crest of the pubis, and is known under the name of GIMBERNAT'S Ligament. Beneath this arch, the vessels, nerves, and muscles make their exit from the pelvis to the thigh.

CRURAL ARTERY, Arte'ria Crura'lis, Fem'oral Artery, (F.) Artère crurale, A. Pelvi-crurale, (Ch.) is the continuation of the external iliac. It extends from the crural arch to the aperture in the triceps, or to the ham. Chaussier applies the name Artère crurale to the trunk, which extends from the primitive or common iliac to the tibial arteries—embracing, of course, the external iliac, femoral, and popliteal.

CRURAL CANAL, Crural Ring, Fem'oral canal or ring. M. Jules Cloquet has described this canal with minuteness, and given it the name Anneau crural, Anneau fémorel. It is nearly an inch long, triangular, more spacious above than below, and shorter and broader in the female than in the male. Its upper orifice is bounded, anteriorly, by the crural arch; posteriorly, by the crista of the pubis; on the outer side by the psoas and iliacus muscles, covered by the iliac aponeurosis, and, at the inner, by Gimbernat's ligament. This orifice is covered by the peritoneum, and, according to M. Cloquet, is closed by a more or less resisting septum, which he has named Septum crura'le, Crural septum. In its course, the crural canal has its anterior parietes formed by the superficial expansion of the fascia lata: the posterior by the pectineus, covered by the deep-seated expansion of the fascia; and more externally by the psoas and iliacus muscles, covered by an expansion of the fascia iliaca. Its inferior orifice is formed by the foramen of the fascia lata, which gives passage to the vena saphæna. It is at the upper orifice of this canal, that Femoral or Crural Hernia, Hernie inguinale of Chaussier, occurs: which would be more common, were it not for the fibrous cellular septum there situate.

CRURAL NERVE proceeds from the lumbar plexus, and is situate at the outer side of the psoas muscle and crural artery. After it has passed under the crural arch, it divides into cutaneous and muscular branches. One of the branches, which is larger than the rest, is called the Saphæna nerve. It gives off filaments to the integuments of the knee, to the inner part of the leg, and to the dorsal surface of the foot. The remainder of the branches of the crural are distributed to the anterior and inner part of the thigh. The Accessory of the Crural Nerve is a term given to the 4th and 5th pairs of lumbar nerves.

CRURAL PLEXUS of Chaussier is the union of the anterior branches of the last four pairs of lumbar nerves, and the first four sacral; forming the lumbar and sacral plexuses of most anatomists.

CRURAL RING, Crural canal—c. Septum, see Crural canal.

CRURAL VEIN, Fem'oral Vein, has the same arrangement as the artery. It receives only one great branch, the saphæna.

CRURAL, Triceps cruris.

CRURA'LIS, Crura'us. A part of the Triceps crural of the French, or of the Trifemorotulien of Chaussier. The cruralis is situate at the anterior, outer, and inner part of the thigh. It arises, fleshy, from between the two trochanters, adheres firmly to most of the fore part of the os femoris, and is inserted, tendinous, into the upper part of the patella, behind the rectus. Its use is to assist the vasti and rectus in the extension of the leg. Under Muscle Triceps Crural, the French describe the cruralis and the two vasti. Some small muscular slips, sometimes found under the cruraus muscle, and inserted into the capsular ligament of the knee-joint, have been called Sub-crura'i.

CUBITAL ARTERY, Arte'ria cubita'lis, A. ulna'ris, arises from the humeral a little below the bend of the elbow; proceeds along the anterior and inner part of the forearm; passes anterior to the ligamentum annulare of the carpus, and goes to form, in the palm of the hand, the superficial palmar arch. Besides the numerous muscular branches, which it gives off in its course, it sends posteriorly the common trunk of the interosseous arteries, and internally, the two cubital recurrent, anterior and posterior,—articular branches, which anastomose on the inside of the elbow with the divisions of the humeral artery.

CUBITAL MUSCLES are two in number. 1. The Cubita'lis anterior seu inter'nus, Flexor carpi ulna'ris, Ulna'ris inter'nus, Epitrochlo-cubito-carpien, Cubito-carpien—(Ch.), is a long muscle, situate at the anterior and inner part of the forearm. CUBITAL NERVE, Ulnar nerve, Cubito-digital—(Ch.), is furnished by the last two or three nerves of the brachial plexus, and is distributed to the inner and anterior side of the forearm; to the inner part of the palm and of the back of the hand, and to the last two or three fingers.

CUTANEOUS EXHALATION AND ABSORPTION are those which take place from the skin.

CUTANEOUS, MIDDLE POSTERIOR, see Sciatic nerve, lesser.

CUTANEOUS NERVES, Cutaneal Nerves, so called, of the upper extremity, are two in number. They are given off from the brachial plexus. The internal cutaneous, Cubito-cutané, (Ch.,) descends along the inner part of the arm, and divides above the elbow into two branches; the outermost of which follows the outer edge of the biceps, and spreads over the anterior and inner part of the forearm; and the innermost accompanies the basilic vein, passing to the corresponding side of the hand and little finger. The external cutaneous, Radio-cutané (Ch.,) Mus'culo-Cuta'neus, Per'forans CASSE'RII, passes outwards; perforates the coraco-brachialis; descends along the anterior and outer part of the arm; passes as far as the middle fold of the elbow under the median cephalic; and descends along the anterior and outer edge of the forearm. At some distance above the wrist, it divides into two branches; an outer, which is distributed on the back of the hand, the thumb and index finger; and an inner, which descends on the muscles of the thumb into the palm of the hand, and divides into fine filaments, which may be traced to the fingers.

Cutaneous nerves, Middle cutaneous, two in number, are branches of the crural or femoral nerve. They are distributed to the integument of the middle and lower part of the thigh and of the knee.

Nervus Cutaneus Minor, Lesser internal cutaneous nerve, Nerve of Wrisberg, takes its origin from the axillary plexus, but is more particularly connected with the ulnar nerve. It soon separates from the ulnar, running afterwards between it and the inner side of the arm. A little below the axilla it divides into two branches, which are distributed to the arm.

Chaussier calls the cephalic and basilic veins the Radial and Cubital Cutaneous.

CUTIS, Pellis, Pella, Co'rium, Derma, Deris, Anthro'pē, Anthro'pen, Skin, (F.) Peau, Derme. A dense, resisting membrane, of a flexible and extensible nature, which forms the general envelope of the body; and is continuous with the mucous membranes, through the different natural apertures. It is generally considered to be formed of three distinct layers—the epidermis, rete or more properly corpus mucosum, and corium (cutis vera, derma). Some anatomists, however, separate it into several others. Its outer surface is covered by a number of small eminences, called papillæ, which are generally regarded as essentially nervous and vascular. The skin is our medium of communication with external bodies. It protects the subjacent parts; is the seat of touch; and through it are exhaled the watery parts of the blood, which are not needed in the nutrition of the body. The state of the skin, as regards heat and dryness, affords useful information in pathological investigations. Its colour, too, requires attention: the paleness of disease is as characteristic as the rosy complexion of health. The colour of the skin varies according to the age, sex, &c. As a general rule, it is finer in the female and child than in the male and adult. In old age it becomes light-coloured, thin, and dry. It likewise varies according to the races, &c.

(F.) Cyanose, Maladie bleu, Jeûre bleu. A disease in which the surface of the body is coloured blue. It is often symptomatic, and commonly depends on a direct communication remaining between the cavities of the right and left side of the heart; Patency of the fora'men ora'le, Acleitrocardie.—Piorry. Such communication does not, however, always occasion the blue disease, but it is generally thought that the disease never exists without this state of parts; or without some obstacle to the circulation in the right side of the heart. The blueness does not seem to be owing to the admixture of black and red blood. A child affected with blueness is said to be cyanosed, (F.) Cyanosé.

It comprises the following chief varieties.

CYNANCHE EPIDEMICA, Cynanche maligna—c. Externa, C. Parotidæa—c. Faucium, C. tonsillaris—c. Gangræna, Cynanche maligna—c. Laryngea, Laryngitis.

CYNANCHE MALIG'NA, C. gangræno'sa seu epidem'ica seu pur'puro-parotidæ'a seu ulcero'sa, Feb'ris epidem'ica cum Angi'nâ, Empres'ma Paristhmî'tis Malig'na, Tonsilla'rum gangræ'na, Tonsillæ pestilen'tes, Epidem'ica gutturis lues, Pestilens fau'cium affectus, Pædan'chonê [?], Gangræna Tonsilla'rum, Ulcus Syriacum, Garrôit'lo, Carbunculus angino'sus, Angi'na ulcero'sa seu ulcusculo'sa seu epidem'ica seu gangræno'sa seu malig'na seu fau'cium malig'na, Isthmoty'phus, Putrid or Ulcerous Sore Throat, Gangrenous Inflammation of the Pharynx, (F.) Angine gangræneuse ou Maligne. It is characterized by crimson redness of the mucous membrane of the fauces and tonsils; ulcerations, covered with mucus; and spreading sloughs, of an ash or whitish hue; the accompanying fever typhus. It is often epidemic, and generally contagious [?]; and is frequently found accompanying scarlet fever,—giving rise to the variety, Scarlatina maligna, Canker rash. Cynanche maligna has been made to include both diphtheritic and gangrenous pharyngitis. See Pharyngitis, diphtheritic.

The general treatment is the same as in typhus; and stimulant antiseptic gargles must be used, consisting, for example, of the decoction of bark and muriatic acid.

CYNANCHE MAXILLARIS, c. Parotidæa—c. Œsophagea, Œsophagitis.

CYNANCHE PAROTIDÆA, C. Parotides seu exter'na seu maxilla'ris, Empres'ma Parotit'is, Parotitis, P. epidem'ica seu erysipelato'sa seu contagio'sa seu spuri'a seu sero'so glu'tinê tul'mens, Parot'ia, Parotidit'is, Angina maxilla'ris seu externa seu parotidæ'a exter'na, Gissa, Erythrochæ'ras, Genyocyan'chê, Gnathocyan'chê, Inflammatiô parotidum, Inflatiô parotidum, Catar'rhus Bellinsulæ'nis, Branks (Scotch), Mumps, (F.) Inflammation de la Parotide, Oreillons, Owles. The characteristic symptoms are:—a painful tumour of the parotid gland, or of the cellular tissue surrounding it, or of both, not of the suppurative kind; frequently extending to the maxillary gland. It is very conspicuous externally, and is often accompanied with swelling of the testes in the male, and of the mammae in the female; the testes being sometimes absorbed afterwards. It is generally epidemic, and apparently contagious. [?] The treatment is very simple; the adoption merely of the antiphlogistic plan, under which it usually soon disappears. When inflammation of the mammae or testes supervenes, it must be treated as if idiopathic.

Epidem'ic Parotit'is or Mumps is also termed Parotit'is polymor'pha seu epidem'ica seu specif'ica.

CYNANCHE PHARYNGE'A, Empres'ma Paristhmî'tis Pharyngea, Isthmî'tis, Pharyngit'is, Inflammatiô Pharyngis, Parasyran'chê, Anginæ inflammatoriæ, Sp. iv.—(Boerhave.) (F.) Angine Pharyngée, Catarre pharyngien. Inflammation of the pharynx.

This disease can hardly be said to differ, in pathology or treatment, from Cynanche tonsillar. The same may be remarked of the Cynanche Œsophage'a, Œsophagit'is.

CYNANCHE PRUNELLA, C. Tonsillaris—c. Purpuro-parotidæa, Cynanche maligna—c. Simplex, Isthmitis—c. Stridula, C. trachealis.

CYNANCHE TONSILLA'RIS, C. fau'cium seu Prunella, Empres'ma Paristhmî'tis Tonsilla'ris, Synan'chê, Amygdalit'is, Branci, Branchi, Hyan'chê, Tonsillit'is, Paristhmî'tis, Paristhmî'tis, Dysphag'ia inflammatori'a, Antiadit'is, Angina inflammatori'a seu cum tumo'rê seu tonsilla'ris seu syncho'ladis seu sanguin'ea seu vera et legit'ima, Inflammatiô Tonsilla'rum, Antiadon'cus inflammatori'us, Inflammatory Sore Throat, Common Squinancie, Squinzey, Squinsy or Quinsy, (F.) Amygdalite, Inflammation des Amygdales, Angine tonsillaire, Pharyngite tonsillaire, Esquinancie, Squinancie, Catarrhe gutturale, Angine gutturale inflammatoire. The characteristic symptoms of this affection are, swelling and florid redness of the mucous membrane of the fauces, and especially of the tonsils; painful and impeded deglutition, accompanied with inflammatory fever. It is generally ascribed to cold, and is one of the most common affections of cold and temperate climates. It usually goes off by resolution, but frequently ends in suppuration.

Common sore throat is an affection of no consequence. It requires merely rest, and the observance of the antiphlogistic regimen. When more violent,—in addition to this,—bleeding, local or general, or both,—purgatives, inhalation of the steam of warm water; acid, or emollient gargles; rubefacients externally, or sinapisms or blisters. When suppuration must inevitably occur, the continued use of the inhaler must be advised, and an opening be made into the abscess as soon as pus shall have formed. If the patient be likely to be suffocated by the tumefaction, bronchotomy may be necessary.

CYNANCHE TRACHEALIS, Cynanche larynge'a of some, C. stridula, Suffocatiô stridula, Asthma infan'tum, Catar'rhus suffocati'vus Barbadoensis, Angi'na polypo'sa seu membrano'cea seu pulpo'sa seu pernici'o'sa seu inflammatori'a seu suffocatori'a seu strepito'sa seu cani'na seu exsudatori'a seu tracheal'is, Empres'ma bronchit'is seu bronchlemmit'is, Laryngit'is et Tracheit'is infan'tilis, Laryngit'is exsudati'va seu membrano'cea seu polypo'sa, Laryngostasis seu Laryngo-tracheit'is, Laryngo-tracheitis with diphtherit'ic exudatiô, Laryngo'acê, Orthopnœ'a cynan'chica, Cynanchorhœpne'a, Pædan'chonê [?], Morbis Strangulatori'us, Trachit'is, Trocheit'is, Trachelit'is, Diphtherit'is tracheal'is, Expectoratiô Sol'ida, Cauma Bronchit'is, Croup, Roup, Hives, Bold Hives, Choak, Stuffing, Rising of the lights, (F.) Angine laryngée et trachéale, Laryngite avec production de fausses membranes, Laryngite pseudo-membraneuse. A disease characterized by sonorous and suffocative breathing; harsh voice; cough, ringing, or like the barking of a dog; fever, highly inflammatory. It is apt to be speedily attended with the formation of a false membrane, which lines the trachea beneath the glottis, and occasions violent dyspnoea and suffocation, but is sometimes expectorated. The dyspnoea, as in all other affections of the air-passages, has evident exacerbations. It differs in its character in different situations; being infinitely more inflammatory in some places than in others, and hence the success obtained by different modes of treatment. It chiefly affects children, and is apt to recur, but the subsequent attacks are usually less and less severe.

As a general rule, it requires the most active treatment; bleeding from the arm or neck, so as to induce paleness; leeches applied to the neck, &c., according to the age,—the warm bath, blisters to the neck or chest, and purgatives. Formidable as the disease may be, if this plan be followed early, it will generally be successful. Many specifics have been recommended, but the search has been idle and fruitless. The majority of cases of what are called croup are not of this inflammatory cast; but are more of a spasmodic character, and have been termed by the French faux croup, and with us are occasionally termed spasmodic croup. They generally yield to an emetic and the warm bath.

separated from the bark of this plant by M. Vauquelin, to which he has given the name Daphnine. The plants of the genus owe their vesicating property to this principle.

Its external surface is towards the scrotum; the internal towards the tunica vaginalis. Frederick Lobstein and Breschet consider, that it proceeds from an expansion of the fibrous cord, known by the name Gubernaculum Testis.

DEATH, (Sax. deað.) (Sc.) Dede, Deid; Apobiosis, Abiosis, Extinctio, Obitus, Psychorag'ia, Psychorrhag'ia, Le'thum, Letum, Mors, Inter'itus, Than'atos, Decease, (F.) Mort. Definitive cessation of all the functions, the aggregate of which constitute life. Real Death, Apothanasia, is distinguished from asphyxia or apparent death—the latter being merely a suspension of those same functions. But it is often difficult to judge of such suspension, and the only certain sign of real death is the commencement of putrefaction. At times, therefore, great caution is requisite to avoid mistakes. Death is commonly preceded by some distressing symptoms, which depend on lesion of respiration, circulation, or of the cerebral functions, and which constitute the agony. That which occurs suddenly, and without any, or with few, precursory signs, is called sudden death. It is ordinarily caused by disease of the heart, apoplexy, the rupture of an aneurism, or by some other organic affection. Death is natural, (Sc.) Strae-death, when it occurs as the result of disease: violent, when produced by some forcible agency. It may likewise affect the whole body, or a part only; hence the difference between somatic and molecular death.

The chief varieties of the modes of death may be thus given:

Death beginning at the heart,	}	Suddenly—Syn-cope: Gradual—
" "		Asphyxia.
" "		in the brain—Apoplexy.
" "		in the gray
" "		matter of the
" "		{ Paralysis of
		pneumogastrics,
		medulla,
		{ &c.
" "		in the blood [?]-necræmia.

As it was at one time conceived, with Bichat, that death must commence in the heart, lungs, or brain, these organs were called d'tria mortis, 'the halls of death.'

DEATH, APPARENT, Asphyxia.

DEATH, BLACK. Pestis nigra, Black Plague, (F.) Peste noire. The plague of the 14th century was so called, which is supposed to have proved fatal in Europe to 25,000,000 of people.—Hecker.

DEBILIS, Infirm.

DEBILITANTS, Debilitant'ia, Antidynam'ica, Philadynam'ica, from debilitare, itself from debilis, quasi dehabilis, 'weak,' 'to weaken.' Remedies exhibited for the purpose of reducing excitement. Antiphlogistics are, hence, debilitants.

DEBILITAS, Debility—d. Erethisica, see Irritable—d. Nervosa, Neurasthenia, see Irritable—d. Visus, Asthenopia.

DEBILITY, Debilitas, Asthenia, Hyposthenia, Blaci'a, Anergesia, Anergia, Weakness, (F.) Faiblesse. A condition, which may be induced by a number of causes. It must not be confounded with fatigue, which is temporary, whilst debility is generally more permanent.

Debility may be real, or it may be apparent; and, in the management of disease, it is important to attend to this. At the commencement of fever, for example, there is often a degree of apparent debility, which prevents the use of appropriate means, and is the cause of much evil. Excitement is more dangerous than debility.

DÉBOITEMENT, Luxation.

DÉBORDEMENT (F.), from déborder (dé and border), 'to overflow.' A popular term for one or more sudden and copious evacuations from the bowels. It is chiefly applied to bilious evacuations of this kind—Débordement de Bile.

DÉBRIDEMENT (F.), Franorum solutio, from (F.) débrider (dé and brider), 'to unbride.' The removal of filaments, &c., in a wound or abscess, which prevent the discharge of pus. In a more general acceptation, it means the cutting of a soft, membranous, or aponeurotic part, which interferes with the exercise of any organ whatever; thus, in paraphimosis, débridement of the prepuce is practised to put an end to the inflammation of the glans: in strangulated hernia, débridement of the abdominal ring is had recourse to, to remove the stricture of the intestine, &c.

DEC'AGRAMME, from deka, 'ten,' and γραμμα, 'a gramme.' The weight of ten grammes, 154.34 grains Troy.

DECIDENTIA, Cataptoxis, Epilepsy.

DECIDUA, Decidua membrana.

DECID'UA MEMBRA'NA, Decid'ua, Decid'uous Membrane, from decidere, 'to fall off,' (de and cadere.) So called on account of its being considered to be discharged from the uterus at parturition. A membrane, formerly defined to be the outermost membrane of the fetus in utero; and still so defined by some—as by Dr. Lee. Chaussier calls it Epicho'ri'on: by others, it has been called Membr'na cadu'ca Hunteri, M. floeculeu'ta seu cellulo'sa seu sinuo'sa seu commu'nis seu præcis'tens, Decidua externa seu spongio'sa, Tunica exterior ovi seu cadu'ca seu crassa, Membr'na cribro'sa seu ovi mater'na seu muc'o'sa seu uteri intern'a evol'u'ta, Epio'né, Placent'a uteri succenturiat'us, Subplacent'a, Nidament'um, Anhis'tous membrane, (F.) Caduque, C. vraie, Membrane caduque, Épio'ne, Pério'ne;—prior to the time of the Hunters, called Cho'ri'on spongio'sum seu tomento'sum seu fungo'sum seu reticulat'um, &c., Tunica filamento'sa, Shaggy Chorion, Spongy Chorion, &c. Great diversity has prevailed regarding this membrane and its reflected portion.

It exists before the germ arrives in the uterus—as it has been met with in tubal and ovarian pregnancies; and is occasioned by a new action, assumed by the uterine vessels at the moment of conception. Chaussier, Lobstein, Gardien, Velpeau, and others, consider it to be a sac, without apertures, completely lining the uterus, and that when the ovum descends through the tube, it pushes the decidua before it, and becomes enveloped in it, except at the part destined to form the placenta. That portion of the membrane which covers the ovum, forms the Membr'na decid'ua reflex'a, (F.) Caduque réfléchié, Membrane caduque réfléchié, according to them—the part lining the uterus being the Decidua U'teri, (F.) Caduque utérine. Towards the end of the fourth month, the decidua reflexa disappears. The very existence of a Tunica decidua reflexa has, however, been denied. This last membrane has received various names. Dr. Granville, regarding it as the external membrane of the ovum, has termed it Cortex ovi. It has also been termed Involu'crum membrana'ceum, Membr'na retiform'is cho'r'ii seu filamento'sa seu adventi'ia seu crassa, Oovline and Decid'ua protr'na. To the membrane which, according to Bojanus and others, is situate between the placenta and the uterus, and which he considers to be produced at a later period than the decidua vera, he gave the name membr'na decid'ua serot'ina.

Histological researches seem to show, that the decidua is an altered condition of the lining membrane of the uterus, with a whitish secretion filling the uterine tubular glands. The decidua reflexa is probably formed by the agency of nucleated cells from the plastic materials thrown out from the decidua uteri; in the same manner as the chorion is formed in the Fallopian Tube from plastic materials thrown out from its lining membrane. That the decidua reflexa is not a mere inverted portion of the decidua uteri is shown by the fact, that the texture of the two is by no means identical.

DECIDUA PROTRUSA, Decidua reflexa.

DECIDUOUS MEMBRANE, Decidua (membrana).

DEC'IGRAMME, Decigram'ma, from decimus, 'the tenth part,' and γραμμα, 'gramme.' The tenth part of the gramme in weight; equal to a little less than two grains, French; 1.543 Troy.

DECIMA'NA FEBRIS, from decem, 'ten.' An intermittent, whose paroxysms return every 10th day or every 9 days. It is supposititious.

DECLAMAT'ION, Declama'tio, from de, and clamare, clamatum, 'to cry out.' The art of depicting the sentiments by inflections of the voice, accompanied with gestures, which render the meaning of the speaker more evident, and infuse into the minds of the auditors the emotions with which he is impressed. Declamation may become the cause of disease: the modification, produced in the pulmonary circulation,—accompanied by the great excitement, sometimes experienced,—is the cause of many morbid affections; particularly of pneumonia, hæmoptysis, and apoplexy. In moderation, it gives a healthy excitement to the frame.

DÉCLIN, Decline.

DECLINATIO, Decline.

DECLINE, Declin'atio, Inclina'tio, Decrement'um, Remis'sio, Parac'mé, Parac'masis, (F.) Déclin, from de, and clinare, 'to bend.' That period of a disorder or paroxysm, at which the symptoms begin to abate in violence. We speak, also, of the decline of life, or of the powers, (F.) Déclin de l'âge, L'âge de déclin, when the physical and moral faculties lose a little of their activity and energy. See Pthisis, and Tabes.

DÉCLIVE, (F.) Decliv'is, from de, 'from,' and clinus, 'acclivity.' Inclining downwards. This epithet is applied to the most depending part of a tumour or abscess.

DÉCOCTÉ, Decoction.

DECOCT'ION, Decoc'tio, from decoquere, 'to boil,' (de and coquere, coctum.) Eps'e'sis, Apoz'es'is, Zesis, Heps'e'sis, Apeps'is, (F.) Décoction. The operation of boiling certain ingredients in a fluid, for the purpose of extracting the parts soluble at that temperature. Decoction, likewise, means the product of this operation, to which the terms Decoctum, Zema, Apeps'e'ma, Ap'ozem, Apoz'ema, Heps'e'ma, Chylus and Eps'e'ma, (F.) Décocté, Hydrolé, Hydrolite, have been applied according to ancient custom, in order to avoid any confusion between the operation and its product;—as præparatio is used for the act of preparing; præparatum, for the thing prepared.

DELIRIOUS. Same etymon as DELIRIUM. Delirans, Delirius, Excerebra'tus, Alloch'oös, Alie'nus, Parale'rus, Raving, (Sc.) Delieret, Delirie, (F.) Délirant. One who is in a state of delirium. That which is attended by delirium. The French use the term Fièvre pernicieuse délirante for a febrile intermittent, in which delirium is the predominant symptom.

DELIRIUM, from de, 'from,' and lira, 'a ridge between two furrows' [?]: more probably from de, and ληρημα, 'a silly saying or action.' Parac'opé, Phreni'tis, Phledoni'a, Desipien'tia, Aphros'yné, Parale'ra'ma, Parale're'sis, Paralog'ia, Phanta'sia, Paraphros'yné, Emo'tio, Leros, Parana'ca, Alloph'asis, Delira'tio, Delirament'um, (Sc.) Ravery, Roving, (F.) Délire, Égarement d'esprit, &c., Transport, Idéosynchysie. Straying from the rules of reason; wandering of the mind. Hippocrates used the word μανια, mania, for delirium sine febre, and the Greek words given above for delirium cum febre. In different authors, also, we find the words, Paraph'ora, Paraph'otes, Paraphrene'sis, Paraphren'ia, Phrene- sis, Phreneti'asis, &c., for different kinds of delirium. Delirium is usually symptomatic.

DELIRIUM EBRIOSITATIS, Drunken madness; also D. tremens—d. Epileptic, see Epilepsy—d. Furiosum, Mania—d. Maniacum, Mania.

A state of delirium and agitation, peculiar to those addicted to spirituous liquors, with great sleeplessness. It is preceded by indisposition, lassitude, watchfulness, headach, and anorexia; the delirium and tremors, Tremor potato'rum, most commonly recurring in paroxysms. It is caused by the habitual and immoderate use of ardent spirits or of opium or tobacco; or rather by abandoning them after prolonged use. The treatment is various. Many have regarded stimulants, with large doses of opium to induce rest, to be indispensable. It is certain, however, that the expectant system will often, if not generally, be successful; and, it is probable, a cure effected in this manner will be more permanent than when produced by excitants.

DELIRUS, Delirious.

DÉLITESCENCE, see Repercussion.

DELITESCENTIA, see Repercussion.

DELIVER, (Prov.) lay, same etymon as the next. 'To put to bed.' To disburden of a child.

DÉLIVRANCE (F.), (de, and liver, 'to set free.')

An expression, which, in common language, signifies the action of delivering, liberatio, but in the practice of obstetrics, means the extrusion of the secundines, either spontaneously or by the efforts of art. This completion of delivery—partus secundarius, secundinarum expul'sio seu extractio, is produced by the same laws as the expulsion of the fœtus. Sometimes, the after-birth follows the child immediately; at others, it is retained; and requires manual interference to remove it. The following are the chief cases in which this becomes necessary. 1. Intimate adhesion between the placenta and paries of the uterus. 2. Spasmodic contraction of the orifice of the uterus. 3. Hour-glass contraction. 4. Torpor or hemorrhage after the expulsion of the child, and,—5. Insertion of the placenta at the orifice of the uterus.

DELIVERY, Parturition—d. False, False water.

DÉLIVRE, Secundines.

D. consol'ida seu Seg'etium seu Versic'olor, Calcitra'pa, Consol'ida Rega'lis, Branching Larkspur, Stagerued. Ord. Ranunculaceæ. Sex. Syst., Polyandria Trigynia. (F.) Pied d'alouette des champs. It has been employed as a vermifuge. The flowers have been used in ophthalmia, and the seeds have the same property as those of Stavesacre.

DELPHINIUM CONSOLIDA, Delphinium—d. Segetum, Delphinium.

DELPHINIUM STAPHISAGRIA. The systematic name of the Staves' acre, Staphisagria, Phtheiroid-tonum, Phtheirium, Staphis, Pedicularia, (F.) Staphisaigre, Herbe aux Poux, Dauphinoise. The seeds, Staphisagria, (Ph. L. and E.) have a disagreeable smell; a nauseous, bitterish, hot taste; and are cathartic, emetic, and vermifuge: owing, however, to the violence of their operation, they are seldom given internally, and are chiefly used in powder, mixed with hair powder, to destroy lice. The active principle of this plant has been separated, and received the name Delphin'ia, (F.) Delphine, Delphinine. It is extremely acrid, and has been recently used, like veratrum, in tic douloureux, paralysis and rheumatism. It is used in the form of ointment, or in solution in alcohol, (gr. x to xxx, or more, to ℥j,) applied externally.

DELPHINIUM VERSICOLOR, Delphinium.

DELPHYS, Uterus, Vulva.

DELTA, Vulva.

DELTIIFORMIS, Deltoid.

DEL'TOID, Deltoïdes, Delto'des, Deltoïdeus, Deltiform'is, (F.) Deltoides, from the Greek capital letter Δ, δέλτα, and εἶδος, 'resemblance.' Sous-acromio-clavi-huméral of Dumas; Sus-acromio-huméral of Chaussier. A triangular muscle forming the fleshy part of the shoulder, and covering the shoulder-joint. It extends from the outer third of the clavicle, from the acromion and spine of the scapula, to near the middle and outer part of the os humeri, where it is inserted by means of a strong tendon. This muscle raises the arm directly upwards, when the shoulder is fixed, and carries it anteriorly or posteriorly, according to the direction of the fibres, which are thrown into action. If the arm be rendered immovable, the deltoid acts inversely and depresses the shoulder.

DELTOÏDE, Deltoid.

In common parlance, and even in legal language, this word is synonymous with insanity. Physicians, however, have applied it to those cases of unsound mind which are characterized by a total loss of the faculty of thought, or by such an imbecility of intellect that the ideas are extremely incoherent, there being at the same time a total loss of the power of reasoning. Mania and melancholy are apt to end in this, if possible, more deplorable state. Dotage is the Dementia of the aged—Mo'ria demens lere'ma, Lere'ma, Lere'sis, Lerus, Delir'atio Senum, Ament'ia Sen'il'is, Pueril'itas, Delir'ium Sen'il'e, Anil'itas, Senile Insanity, Senile Dementia, Insanity of the aged, (Sc.) Doitrie,—a form of moral insanity, in which the whole moral character of the individual is changed.

Medicines supposed to be capable of correcting certain acrid conditions imagined to exist in the humours. Substances of a mucilaginous or saccharine nature belong to this class. Demulcents may act directly on the parts with which they come in contact; but in other cases, as in catarrh, their effect is produced by contiguous sympathy; the top of the larynx being soothed by them first, and indirectly the inflamed portion of the air-passages. In diseases of the urinary organs, they have no advantage over simple diluents.—See Diluents and Emollients. The following are demulcents;—Acaciæ Gummi; Althææ Folia et Radix; Amygdalæ; Amylum; Avenæ Farina; Cera; Cetaceum; Cydoniæ Semina; Fucus Crispus; Glycyrrhiza; Hordeum; Lichen; Linum; Olivæ Oleum; Sassafras Medulla; Sesamum; Sevum; Tragacantha, and Ulmus.

A disease, which first appeared in the years 1827 and 1828, in the West Indies, and in the southern states of North America. It was extremely violent in its symptoms, but not often fatal. It usually commenced with great languor, chilliness, and pain in the tendons about the smaller joints. To these symptoms succeeded burning heat and redness of the skin, pains in the muscles of the limbs or in the forehead, with vomiting or nausea. The fever continued for one, two or three days, and usually terminated by copious perspiration. In different places, it put on different appearances; but seems in all to have been a singular variety of rheumatic fever. The usual antiphlogistic treatment was adopted, and successfully.

DENTITIO, Dentition—d. Difficilis, Dysodontiasis.

DENTIT'ION, Teething, Dentit'io, Denti'tis, Odontoph'ia, Odonti'asis, Odont'osis, from dentit'io, (dens, dentis, 'a tooth,') 'to breed teeth.' The exit of the teeth from the alveoli and gums; or rather the phenomena which characterize the different periods of their existence. The germs of the first teeth, dentis lac'tei or milk teeth, (F.) dens de lait, are visible in the foetus about the end of the second month; and they begin to be ossified from the end of the third to that of the sixth month. At birth, the corona of the incisors is formed, but that of the canine is not completed; and the tubercles of the molares are not yet all united. Gradually the fang becomes developed; and at about six or eight months begins what is commonly called, the first dentit'ion, Odontia dentitio'nis lactan'tium. The two middle incisors of the lower jaw commonly appear first; and, some time afterwards, those of the upper jaw; afterwards, the two lateral incisors of the lower jaw; and then those of the upper, followed by the four anterior molares; the canine, or eye-teeth, at first, those of the lower, and, afterwards, those of the upper jaw, next appear; and, subsequently and successively, the first 4 molares—2 above and 2 below. 1 on each side. The whole number of the primary, temporary, deciduous, shedding or milk-teeth. (dentis tempora'rii,) (F.) Dents de lait, is now 20.

The eruption of the milk teeth takes place, approximately, in the following order:

- Lateral incisors.....6th to 8th month.
- Central incisors.....7th to 10th month.
- First molar.....12th to 14th month.
- Canines.....15th to 20th month.
- Second molar.....20th to 30th month.

The second dentition or shedding of the teeth, odontia dentitio'nis puerilis, Dedentit'ion, begins about the age of 6 or 7. The germs or membranous follicles of these second teeth—to the number of 32—as well as the rudiments of the teeth themselves, are visible, even in the foetus, with the exception of those of the small molares, which do not appear till after birth. They are contained in alveoli of the same shape as those of the first dentition. Their ossification commences at from 3 to 6 months after birth, in the incisors and first molares; at eight or nine months, in the canine; about three years, in the molares; 3½ in the second great molares, and about 10 years in the last. As the alveolus of a new tooth becomes gradually augmented, the septum between it and that of the corresponding milk tooth is absorbed, and disappears. The root of the milk tooth is likewise absorbed; its corona becomes loose and falls out, and all the first teeth are gradually replaced by the permanent teeth, Dentis serot'ini. This second dentition becomes necessary in consequence of the increased size of the jaws. The new teeth have neither the same direction nor the same shape as the old; and they are more numerous, amounting till the age of 25, (sooner or later), to 28. About this period, a small molaris appears at the extremity of each jaw, which is called Dens sapient'ie or wisdom tooth, wit tooth, Dens serot'inus, Dens saphroret'icus, D. saphronis'ta, D. saphronis'ter, (F.) Arrière dent, Dent de sagesse, making the whole number of permanent teeth 32.

The eruption of the permanent teeth is remarkable for its general regularity; so that it constitutes an important means for ascertaining the age of the individual during the early period of life.

- First molars.....7th year.
- Central incisors.....8th year.
- Lateral incisors.....9th year.
- First bicuspids.....10th year.
- Second bicuspids.....11th year.
- Canines.....12th year.
- Second molars.....13th year.

The teeth of the lower jaw precede by a few weeks those of the upper.

During the period of dentition, that is, of the first dentition, the infant is especially liable to disease;—the irritation, produced by the pressure of the tooth on the superincumbent gum, sometimes occasioning pyrexia, convulsions, diarrhoea, &c., which symptoms are often strikingly relieved by a free division of the distended gum. This disordered condition is called Teething, Odontia dentitio'nis, Odonti'asis, Odontal'gia dentitio'nis, Odaxi'smus.

Depilatories are usually caustic applications, in which quicklime or some other alkaline substance, sulphuret of iron, &c., enter.

DEPILATORY, COLLEY'S, seems to consist of quicklime and a portion of sulphuret of potassa.

Deleroi's depilatory, and Plenc's depilatory, have a similar composition. They all, probably, contain arsenic, in the form of orpiment. The following formula has been given for that of Colley: quicklime, 30 parts; soap lces, 125 parts; sulphur, 4 parts; nitre, 4 parts; orpiment, 12 parts. Another depilatory by F. Boudet is formed of sulphuret of sodium, 3 parts; quicklime, in powder, 10; starch, 10; mix. Rub a little of this powder with water; apply it to the part, and remove the hair in a minute or two with a wooden knife. Dorvault recommends the Depilatory of Martins, which is a sulphuretted sulphuret of calcium; made by passing sulphohydric acid into quicklime to saturation. A little of this is applied to the part, and in eight or ten minutes it becomes solid. It must then be washed off with cold or hot water, when the skin will be found denuded. Another, given by Redwood, is a strong solution of the sulphuret of barium, made into a paste with starch powder. It is used like the one advised by Boudet. Those that do not contain arsenic are, of course, safer.

A pitch plaster, Pitch-cap, is sometimes used as a depilatory. It of course pulls the hair out by the roots.

DIABÈTE, Diabetes—d. Chyloex, Chyluria—d. Faux, see Diabetes—d. Inspide, see Diabetes—d. Sucré, Diabetes (mellitus.)

DIABÈTES, from dia, 'through,' and βαίω, 'I pass.' Urinæ profluvium, Hyperdiure'sis, Sipho urinæ, Urorrhag'ia, Polyuria, Hydrops ad Mat'ulam seu Matellæ. Polyure'sis, Uroze'mia, Urorrhœ'a, Dipsacœs, Diarrhœ'a in Urinâ seu urin'osa, (F.) Diabète, Flux d'Urine. A disease, characterized by great augmentation and often manifest alteration in the secretion of urine; with excessive thirst, and progressive emaciation. Cullen has described two species:—Diabetes insip' idus and D. Mellitus; the former, (F.) Diabète faux ou insipide, Diabète, being, simply, a superabundant discharge of limpid urine, of its usual, urinary taste: the latter, D. Mellitus, called, also, Parv'ia Mell'ita, Diabetes Anglicus seu verus, Melituria, Melithyperuria, Glucosuria, Glycyrrhœ'a urino'sa, Uroze'mia mell'ita, Saccharorrhœ'a urino'sa, Phthis'uria, Uro-phthi'sis, Tabes diure'tica seu diabética, Dyspeps'ia saccharig'ena, Apocœno'sis Diabetes Mell'itus, Saccharine diabetes, (F.) Diabète sucré, Hyperurorrhée saccharine, Phthisurie sucrée,—falls under the definition given above. The quantity of urine, discharged in the 24 hours, is sometimes excessive, amounting to 30 pints and upwards; each pint containing sometimes 2½ oz. saccharine matter. This replaces the urea, which is not found in quantity in the urine of those labouring under diabetes. Where the disease is situate is not clear. The whole system of nutrition, however, seems to be morbidly implicated. A part of the urine must be formed at the expense of the system, as the egesta frequently far exceed the solid and liquid ingesta. On dissection, no morbid appearance is met with, sufficient to enable us to fix on the seat of this distressing affection.

All the remedies that have been tried have usually been found insufficient in D. Mellitus.

D. insip'idus, Hyperure'sis aquo'sa, Hydruria, Hydrure'sis, Parv'ia incontineus aquo'sa, Diabètes spur'ius, Urorrhœ'a, Ureal Diabetes, (F.) Polyurie, Hyperurorrhée, Diabète insipide, Faux diabète, which occurs in hysterical habits, and has, hence, been called D. hyster'icus, is of comparatively trifling moment. Exclusive diet, and attention to the state of the cutaneous transpiration, which have sometimes produced good effects in D. Mellitus, have most commonly failed.

the left, into the corresponding subclavian vein. The two inferior diaphragmatic veins open into the vena cava inferior.

If caused, as it often is, by improper matters in the intestinal canal, these must be evacuated; and the astringent plan of treatment must not be adopted, unless the discharges seem kept up by irritability of the intestines, or unless they are colliquative. The indiscriminate use of astringents is to be deprecated.

A very fatal diarrhœa prevails amongst the native inhabitants of India, to which Mr. Tytler has given the name Diarrhœ'a hec'tica, because, like hectic fever, it seems to obtain habitual possession of the constitution, to operate upon it with scarcely any perceptible intermission, and, in general, to defy the most powerful remedies.

The almost inappreciable time, which elapses between the diastole and systole has been called periesytolē, and that which succeeds to the diastole, peridiastole. When we speak of the contraction or systole of the heart, as well as of its diastole or dilatation, we mean that of the ventricles. This dilatation is active.

DIES, He'mera, A day, (F.) Jour. The day is, properly, the period during which the solar light illumines our horizon: but commonly, also, we designate by the word day the period of 24 hours or Nycthe'meron, which is frequently divided into four parts—morning, midday, evening, and midnight. In antiquity, great importance was attached to the observation of days in disease. The medical day is usually reckoned at 24 hours,—universally, in estimating the duration of a disease. In parts of the United States, it comprises only the time when the sun is above the horizon, as regards the administration of medicine, so that if a medicine be ordered to be taken four times a day, it is understood to mean during the 12 hours of day.

At the present day, it signifies a particular kind of food, and, at times, a privation of food and drink;—abstinence. To put any one upon diet, (F.) mettre quelqu'un à la diète, means to deprive him of his usual nourishment:—milk diet means a diet of milk, &c. See Aliment, Dietetics, Hygiene, and Regimen.

Every well regulated hospital has certain dietetic regulations. The following Table of Dietary shows the particular regimen that has been selected for the sick, in certain hospitals.

The Diet Scale of the British Navy allows from 31 to 35½ ounces of dry nutritious matter daily; of which 26 ounces are vegetable, and the rest animal—9 ounces of salt meat, or 4½ ounces of fresh.

That of the Navy of the United States is as follows:—Three days in the week—Pork, 16 oz.; beans or peas, 7 oz.; biscuit, 14 oz.; pickles or cranberries, 1 oz.; sugar, 2 oz.; tea, ¼ oz.;—40¼ oz. Two days in the week—Beef, 16 oz.; flour, 8 oz.; fruit, dried, 4 oz.; biscuit, 14 oz.; tea and sugar, 2½ oz.; pickles or cranberries, 1 oz.;—45¼ oz. Two days in the week—Beef, 16 oz.; rice, 8 oz.; butter, 2 oz.; cheese, 2 oz.; biscuit, 14 oz.; tea and sugar, 2½ oz.; pickles or cranberries, 1 oz.;—45¼ oz.

In the Edinburgh workhouse the total allowance of dry food is about 17 ounces—13 ounces vegetable, and 4 ounces animal. In the Edinburgh children's poor-house, the diet consists of milk and porridge, barley broth and bread, amounting to 13 ounces of vegetable food to 4 ounces of animal. These allowances have been found ample for the maintenance of health. Perhaps the case of the smallest quantity of food on which life was vigorously supported was that of Cornaro,—not more than 12 ounces a day, chiefly of vegetable matter, for a period of 58 years.

DIET DRINK. A decoction or potion, variously composed, and used in considerable quantity, for the purpose of purifying the blood. The Decoctum Lusitanicum or Lisbon Diet-drink is one of the most celebrated. See Decoctum Sarsaparillæ Compositum.

DIETARY, TABLE OF, see Diet Scale.

DIÈTE, Diet.

DIETETICS, Diatet'icē, Diatet'ica, Medic'na Diatet'ica; same etymon. (F.) Diététique. A branch of medicine, comprising the rules to be followed for preventing, relieving, or curing diseases by diet. Dietetics is diet administered according to principle. It is an important part of Hygiene. A well regulated system of diet has great power in checking disease, and likewise in preventing it. A proper knowledge of dietetics is, indeed, as important as that of the Materia Medica, strictly so called.

Dietetics has been used, also, synonymously with Hygiene.

DIÉTÉTIQUE, Dietetics.

DIETETISTS, Diatetis'tæ, (F.) Diététistes. Physicians who apply only the rules of dietetics to the treatment of disease.

DIEU-LE-FILT, MINERAL WATERS OF. The waters of Dieu-le-filt, in France, are chalybeate, and much sought after.

DIEURYSMUS, Dilatation.

DIEX'ODOS, from δια, and εξόδος, 'an exit or way out.' Di'odos. Any opening by which an excretion takes place.

DIFFERENTIAL DIAGNOSIS, see Diacritica signa.

DIFFERENTIATION, Development.

DIFFICULTAS INTESTINORUM, Dysentery.

DIFFLATIO, Perspiration.

DIFFORMITÉ, Deformation.

DIFFU'SIBLE, (stimulants) from diffundere, (dis, and fundere, fusus, 'to pour,') 'to pour apart or abroad.' Those stimulating medicines are so called, which augment the action of the vascular and nervous systems in an acute but transitory manner.

DIGAS'TRICUS, from dis, 'twice,' and γαστρῆ, 'a belly;' Biven'ter, B. Maxill'æ, Dep'rimum Maxill'æ Biven'ter, Bigas'ter, (F.) Mastoïdohyogénien, Mastoïdo-génien—(Ch.), Digastrique, Abaisséur de la machoire inférieure. The name Digastricus was formerly given to several muscles. It is now restricted to one of the muscles of the superior hyoid region. The digastricus is thick and fleshy at its extremities, thin and tendinous at its middle. It is attached to the mastoid groove of the temporal bone, and to a fossa at the side of the symphysis menti. Its tendon passes through an aponeurotic ring, which is attached to the os hyoides.

The use of the digastricus is to depress the lower jaw, or to raise the os hyoides, and to carry it forwards or backwards, as in deglutition.

The strong double-bellied muscle, which forms the gizzard of birds, is also called Digastricus.

DIGASTRICUS CRANII, Occipito-frontalis.

DIGASTRIQUE, Digastricus.

DIGENY, see Generation.

DIGERENTIA, Digestives.

DIGES'TIBLE, Concoct'us habilis. Capable of being digested. All food is not equally digestible, and some of the most important is the least so:—the fat of meat, for example. Certain substances, again, are entirely rebellious. The following table exhibits the time required for the stomachal digestion of different alimentary substances, in a well-known case, which fell under the care of Dr. Beaumont. The table is extracted from the Author's Human Health, Philadelphia, 1844. The most digestible substances are taken as the standard, which has been arbitrarily fixed at 1000; and accordingly, aponeurosis, the first article in the table, requiring 3 hours, whilst pigs' feet soured, rice, &c., require but one, its digestibility, compared with that of these aliments, is placed as 333 to 1000; and so of the others. It need scarcely be said, that all these tabular results apply, in strictness, to the individual concerned only; yet they afford useful comparative views, which with exceptions depending upon individual peculiarities, may be regarded as approximations applicable to mankind in general.

* Pigs' feet soured, rice, and tripe soured, being the most digestible articles in the table, are estimated at 1000. † In the case of oils, and other substances of similar nature, which undergo little digestion in the stomach, the time merely indicates the period that elapses before they are sent into the duodenum.

DIGESTIFS, Digestives.

DIGESTIO, Digestion—d. Depravata, Dyspepsia—d. Difficilis, Dyspepsia—d. Laesa, Dyspepsia.

DIGESTION, Digest'io, from digere, 'to dissolve;' Coctio, C. Cibo'rum, Pep'sis, Digestive Proc'ess. Digestion is a function, by means of which alimentary substances, when introduced into the digestive canal, undergo different alterations. The object of this is to convert them into two parts; the one, a reparatory juice, destined to renew the perpetual waste occurring in the economy; the other, deprived of its nutritious properties, to be rejected from the body. This function is composed of a series of organic actions, differing according to the particular organization of the animal. In man they are eight in number, viz: 1. Prehension of food. 2. Mastication. 3. Insalivation. 4. Deglutition. 5. Action of the stomach. 6. Action of the small intestine. 7. Action of the large intestine. 8. Expulsion of the feces.

DIGESTION is also a pharmaceutical operation, which consists in treating certain solid substances with water, alcohol, or other menstrum, at a slightly elevated temperature,—in a sand-bath, for example, or by leaving them exposed for some time to the sun.

DIGESTIVE, see Digestives—d. Principle, Pepsin—d. Process, Digestion.

DIGESTIVE TEXTURE. The particular organic condition of substances which affects their digestibility.

DIGESTIVE TUBE, Canal, alimentary.

DIGESTIVES, Digest'iva, Digerentia; same etymon as Digestion. (F.) Digestifs. A term given, by surgeons, to substances, which, when applied to a wound or ulcer, promote suppuration; as the ceratum resinae, warm cataplasms, fomentations, &c. Such substances are vulgarly termed drawing.

DIG'ITAL, Digit'alis; from digitus, 'a finger;' having the shape of a finger; digitated. Belonging to the fingers.

The Appen'dix vermifor'mis caeci is sometimes called DIG'ITAL APPEN'DIX.

DIGITALE PETITE, Gratiola officinalis.

DIGITALÉ. Same etymon as Digital. (F.) Doigtier. A finger stall. The term Doigtier d'Asdrubali has been given to a small iron instrument used for measuring the dimensions of the pelvis. Placed at the end of the index finger, it adds to its length and enables it to reach the promontory of the sacrum.

DIGITALINE, see Digitalis.

DIGITALIS, from digitus, 'a finger,' because its flower represents a finger; Digitalis purpurea, Baccharis, Bacchar, Baccar, [?] Fox-glove, (Sc.) Deadmen's bells, (Prov.) Flapdock. Ord. Scrophularineæ. Sec. Syst. Didymia Angiospermia. (F.) Digital, Gants de notre dame, Doigtier. The leaves of this plant, which are indigenous in Great Britain, are powerfully sedative, diminishing the velocity of the pulse, diuretic, and sorbefacient. In over-doses, Digitalis causes vomiting, purging, dimness of sight, vertigo, delirium, hiccough, convulsions, and death:—all the symptoms, in short, which characterize the acro-narcotic class of poisons. Its active principle has been called Dig'italine. It is a hundred-fold stronger than the most active preparation of digitalis.

Digitalis has been administered in inflammatory diseases, phthisis, active hemorrhage, dropsy, &c.; but although it is a powerful remedy, it has not been as much employed as it probably would have been in particular cases, owing to the over-strained eulogiums, which many have passed upon it in almost all diseases. The average dose is one grain, in the form of pill, which may be repeated every six or eight hours.

DIGITALIS MINIMA, Gratiola officinalis.

DIGITARIA DACTYLON, Cynodon dactylon. DIGITATION, Dig'it'io, Produce'io dentata, Insertio denticulata, I. digitata, (F.) Dentature, Dentelure. A division into processes having the form of fingers. Several muscles, as the serati, exhibit digitations, similar to those which the fingers form, when held separate.

In Surgery, it means the accidental or preternatural augmentation of a canal or opening; as in aneurisms, varices, &c., or the process of enlarging any aperture or canal. When used so as to obtain a view of parts, as by the speculum, it is termed Dioptri'smus.

DILATATORIUS, Dilator.

DILATING AGENTS, Dilatan'tia, (F.) Dilatants. Certain substances used in surgery, either to keep parts separate which have a tendency to unite—as after opening an abscess, to prevent the edges of the incision from uniting; or to increase and dilate openings of canals, either when natural, or formed accidentally or artificially. These agents differ from each other: the chief are—prepared sponge tents, gentian root, bougies, sounds, dried peas for issues, &c.

DILATOR, Dilatatorius, Diastoleus, (F.) Dilatateur ou Dilatatoire. A muscle, whose office it is to dilate certain parts; such as the inspiratory muscles, which dilate the chest.

DILATOR, Dilatatorium, (F.) Dilatateur. An instrument, used for dilating a wound, excretory canal, or other natural or artificial opening. When employed to obtain an inspection of internal parts, it is termed Speculum, Dioptra, or Dioptron. There are several instruments of this kind, each taking its name from the part to which it is applied; as Speculum Oris, S. Nasi, S. Uteri, &c.

DILATOR, ARNOTT'S. A modification of the old dilators for strictures of the urethra. It consists of a tube of oiled silk, lined with the thin gut of some small animal to make it air-tight, and fixed on the extremity of a small caula, by which it is distended with air or water, from a bag or syringe at the outer end, whilst a stop-cock or valve serves to keep the air or water in, when received. As soon as the bag is passed within the stricture or strictures, as much air is to be injected into it as the patient can easily bear. The instrument is not much used.

DILATORES ALARUM NASI, Compressor Naris.

DILATRIS TINCTORIA, Lachnanthes tinctoria.

DILL, Anethum graveolens.

DILLY, Anthemis cotula.

DILUENTIA, from diluo, (dis, and luere), 'I wash away.' (F.) Délayants. Medicines which have been conceived proper for augmenting the fluidity of the blood and other animal liquids. All aqueous drinks are diluents. They are administered, with great advantage, in various diseases. In fever, water, which is the most familiar diluent, may be freely allowed; the only precaution being to give it hot in the cold stage, cold in the hot, and tepid in the sweating. In diseases, where it is considered necessary to abstract blood largely, diluents should not be given too freely. The abstraction of blood occasions activity of absorption, and the mass is speedily restored. It is also obvious, that in cases of inflammation of the mammæ, in nurses, diluents should not be freely allowed, as they increase the secretion of milk, and add to the irritation. When demulcents are exhibited in cases of urinary disease, they act simply as diluents: their mucilaginous portion is digested in the stomach and small intestine,—the watery portion alone being separated by the kidney.

DILWEED, Anthemis cotula.

DIMETRA, Dihysteria.

The fruit, Persim'mons, Yellow Plums, Winter Plums, Seeded Plums, which is only eatable after frost, (when it is tolerable,) is sometimes made into cakes with bran. These, being dried in an oven, are kept to make beer. When bruised in water, fermentation takes place. The unripe fruit, Diospyros (Ph. U. S.), is distressingly acerb and astringent. It has been used as an astringent. The bark of the tree is extremely bitter, and may be used where bitters are indicated.

Sometimes more than two are seen; but still the disease is termed Diplo'pia and Suffu'sio Multi'plicans. This affection arises from some derangement in the visual axes, in consequence of which, the images are not impressed on corresponding parts of the retina of each eye. At times, the diplopia affects one eye, or each eye when used alone, owing to some irregularity in the curvature, density, or position of the dioptric media. It is then called Unioe'ular Diplopia.

mata, with which the air, clothing, &c., may be infected. Various means have been proposed for this purpose. Those most commonly employed are: chlorine, sulphurous and chlorohydric acid gases, vapours of vinegar, nitrous acid, and what is, perhaps, the most manageable of any, and equally efficacious, chlorinated lime, or any of the chlorides of the alkalis. It is questionable if any chemical action occur between these agents and the miasmata, whence results a compound which is harmless. Disinfection also includes the action of antiseptics.

The Pharmacopœia too, is published under the authority of, and by the members of a college or association; whilst a Dispensatory contains the whole of the Pharmacopœia or Pharmacopœias, with additions by the author, under whose authority alone it usually appears. The Pharmacopœia, in other words, is official; the Dispensatory, generally, private. Formerly, the words were used indiscriminately. See Formulary, and Pharmacopœia.

The ancients distinguished distillation per latus, per ascen'sum, and per descen'sum, according to the direction which the volatilized matters were made to take. In distillation per latus, the apparatus is so arranged, that the vapour passes horizontally through a succession of spaces before reaching the receiver. Distillation per ascensum is the ordinary method by the still. In distillation per descensum, the fire is applied above and around the top of the apparatus; and it is so arranged that the vapour must pass downwards. When dry organic matter is placed in an apparatus for distillation, and heat is applied until all volatile matter is driven out, the process is called dry or destructive distillation.

DOCIMA'SIA PULMO'NUM, D. Pulmonal'is, Pneubiomant'ia, Pneubiomant'ia, Pneubiomant'ia. Lung proof, Respiration proof. Different proofs to which the organs of respiration of a new-born child are subjected, for the purpose of detecting whether it has or has not respired after birth; in other words, whether it was born alive or dead; — Pneusiobogno'sis, Pneusiobios'copē. These consist, chiefly, 1. In testing them with water, for the purpose of seeing whether the lungs are specifically heavier or lighter than that fluid. This is called Docima'sia Pulmo'num hydrostat'ica or the Hydrostatic Test. If lighter, it would be some evidence that the fœtus had respired: 2. In comparing the weight of the lungs with that of the whole body; the weight of lungs in which respiration has taken place being nearly twice as great. This is Docima'sia Pulmo'num Stat'ica, or Plouquet's Test; and, 3. By measuring the circumference of the thorax and lungs; and comparing their dimensions with those of an infant which has not respired. That is Daniel's Test. These tests, singly, afford only probable evidence; but when united, the deductions may be more conclusive.

They have received this name from the dogstar, Canic'ula, Σειριος, Si'rius—a very brilliant star in the constellation of the great dog, which rises and sets, at this time, with the sun. It was formerly believed to be a period particularly unpropitious to health; that it was dangerous to purge during it; and other phantasies were indulged in regard to it.

The union of the two modes of investigation makes the rational physician. These sectarians are likewise called Dog'matists, and their doctrine Dog'matism. The founders of the sect were Hippocrates, Thessalus, Draco, and Polybius; and the most celebrated of its supporters were Diocles of Carysta, Praxagoras of Cos, Chrysippus of Soli, Herophilus, Erasistratus, &c.

The most important in medicine is the

They excite an intolerable, prurient sensation, when applied to the skin; but do not irritate the mucous membrane over which they pass, when administered internally. The Dolichos is a mechanical anthelmintic, and is useful in cases of ascarides lumbricoides, and oxyures vermiculares. Dose, gr. v to x, of the pube, in molasses.

DOS, Dorsum.

DOSAGE, Posology.

DOSE, Dosis, Præbium. The quantity of any substance, which ought to form part of a compound medicine, or ought to be exhibited singly, to produce a desired effect. Many circumstances influence the doses of medicine. Women require smaller doses, as a general principle, than men. Habit has a great effect, as well as climate, age, and idiosyncrasy: all these, and other circumstances, must be taken into account; and every general rule on the subject will be found to have numerous exceptions. Some of the mechanical physicians laid it down as a rule, that the doses of medicines must always be as the square of the constitution!—A matter not easy of calculation.

The following Tables will exhibit an approximation to the proper doses (according to age) of most substances.

TABLE OF DOSES ACCORDING TO AGE.

Age 24	Let the full dose be	1	1 drachm.
18	will require	2-3ds.	2 scruples.
14	- - - -	half.	½ drachm.
7	- - - -	1-3d.	1 scruple.
4	- - - -	1-4th.	15 grains.
3	- - - -	1-6th.	10 grains.
2	- - - -	1-8th.	8 grains.
1	- - - -	1-12th.	5 grains.

The table of doses, according to age, recommended by Dr. Thomas Young, differs in some respects from the above. Either affords a sufficient general approximation. His rule is, that

For children, under twelve years of age, the doses of most medicines must be diminished in the proportion of the age to the age increased by twelve:

$$\text{Thus, at two years, to 1-7th; i. e., } 1-7\text{th} = \frac{2}{2 + 12}$$

At twenty-one the full dose is given.

DOSES, BROKEN. When an agent is given in small portions it is said to be in broken doses;—refractis dosibus.

DOUCHE (F.). In Italian, doccia: modern Latin, ducia; Cataclysmus, Douse. This term is applied to a column of fluid, of a determinate nature and temperature, let fall upon the body. Pumping is a variety of the Douche. In using this kind of bath, the fluid is directed upon the part on which we are desirous of acting. The douches descendantes are those in which the fluid falls from a height,—the douches ascendantes, those administered in diseases of the uterus,—the douches horizontales, where the fluid is impelled horizontally, &c. They may be cold or warm, according to circumstances. The apparatus consists of a reservoir of water having a pipe or plug, by means of which the water can be directed as the practitioner may desire. The Douche communicates a considerable and peculiar shock to the nervous system; and is one of the most successful means for taming the furious maniac. It is, also, useful in chronic rheumatism, stiff joints, &c.

Douches of air are, also, occasionally used, as in cases of obstruction of the Eustachian tube by mucus. They are sent from an air-press—of which Deleau and Kramer have invented one each—through a catheter introduced through the nose into the tube.

Aroideæ or Araceæ. Sex. Syst. Tetrandria Monogynia. This indigenous plant, as some of its names import, is extremely fetid. The property on which its medical virtues are dependent, resides in a volatile principle, which is impaired by long keeping, especially in powder. Dose, of the dried root, Dracontium, (Ph. U. S.) ten to twenty grains. It resembles asafetida and other fetid gums in its properties; in other words, belongs to the class of reputed antispasmodics.

Dragonneau, Ver de Guinée, Ver Filaire, V. de Médine, V. cutané, Veine ou Filaire de Médine.* A genus of worms, frequently met with in Indian and African climes. They are characterized by a filiform body, and are smooth and nearly of equal thickness throughout. The Guinea worm, when small, insinuates itself through the cutaneous pores, and penetrates into the areolar membrane and between the muscles; especially between those of the lower limbs, where it occasions a tumour like a boil, which subsequently suppurates, and the head of the worm appears and emerges gradually. The head must then be seized, and the worm be cautiously rolled round a small cylinder of linen or other substance. Care must be taken not to break it, as great pain and obstinate suppuration might be the consequence.

Considerable obscurity rests on this subject. Some even deny that the cases of Dracunculus, on record, are really those of worms.

DRAINING, Desiccatio, (F.) Dessèchement. The act of drawing off the water from marshes, for the purpose of destroying the unhealthy emanations which proceed from them. It is a well known fact, that from marshes arise certain emanations or miasmata, with the nature of which we are, however, totally unacquainted, but which are the fertile source of intermittents and other diseases. Draining the soil and converting it into arable land changes its character, and the malaria ceases to be given off. It has happened, however, that although in some such situations intermittents have been got rid of, consumptions have taken their place.

Some drinks are exciting and tonic, as the different varieties of beer, wine, and spirits, which we use at table. In a therapeutical point of view, drinks are used to appease the thirst which prevails in febrile affections, or to act as diluents in those and other cases.

The ordinary drinks, according to their chemical composition, are—1. Water, spring water, river water, well water, &c.—2. Juices and infusions of Animal and Vegetable substances, lemon juice, currant juice, whey, tea, coffee, mattee, &c.—3. Fermented Liquors, wines, ale, beer, cider, perry.—4. Spirituos Liquors, brandy, alcohol,

DRUG, Medicamentum, (F.) Droque. A name ordinarily applied to simple medicines, but, by extension, to every substance employed in the cure of disease. Ménage derives it from droga, and this from the Persian drou, 'odour;' because many drugs have a strong odour. It is, doubtless, from the Teutonic trocken, Sax. trigan, 'to dry.'

DRUG. To prescribe or administer drugs. Most commonly, perhaps, to dose to excess with drugs. One who so doses is sometimes called "a druggier." "To drug," also means to tincture with some medicinal article.

The drying of less succulent plants can be effected at a lower temperature. Flores must be dried very carefully, excluding light. Seeds are dried in a place where there is a free current of air. Pulpy fruits may be exposed to a gentle heat in a stove, which may be gradually elevated. Roots may also be dried in the stove: the tuberosus require to be cut in slices.

DYNAMETER, Dynamometer.

DYNAMIC, Dynamical, Dynamical, (F.) Dynamique. Same etymon. In Mechanics, Dynamics investigates the powers whereby bodies are put in motion, and the laws connected therewith. In Biology, that which relates to the vital forces, to the organism in action, Vital Dynamics. The influences of agents on the organism, which are ascribable to neither mechanical nor chemical causes, are sometimes termed dynamic. In this sense, it is a favorite term with the homœopathists, who maintain that, by certain processes, called, in the aggregate, dynamization and potentiizing, the dynamic powers of a medicine may be set free and developed—as by shaking the bottle in which the article is contained, or by mixing an unlimited number of unmedicated globules with one that is medicated, and shaking them together. In this way, the former become potentized!

DYNAMIC DISEASES, see Organic.

DYNAMICUS, Dynamic.

DYNAMIS, Faculty, Force.

DYNAMIZATION, see Dynamic.

DYNAMOMETER, Myodynamiom'eter, Myodynamom'eter, (F.) Dynamomètre, from δυναμις, 'force,' 'vital power,' and μετρον, 'measure.' An instrument, contrived by M. Regnier, for measuring the comparative muscular strength of man and animals. It consists of a spring, which, when pressed upon, causes a needle to move upon a portion of a circle, furnished with a scale of kilogrammes and one of myriagrammes. To measure the strength of the hands, the two branches of the spring are firmly grasped, and brought as near together as the force can carry them. This effort makes the needle traverse, and indicates, on the scale of kilogrammes, the strength of the experimenter's hands. A man, 25 or 30 years of age, exerts a force commonly equal to 50 kilogrammes or 100 pounds.

The strength of the loins of a man, about 30 years of age, as indicated by this instrument, is usually about 30 myriagrammes, or 265 pounds, which shows the weight he is capable of raising.

From experiments made by Peron, in his voyage, on 12 individuals of Van Diemen's Land, 17 of New Holland, 56 of the Island of Timor, 17 Frenchmen belonging to the expedition, and 14 Englishmen in the colony of New South Wales, he found their comparative strength, indicated by the dynamometer, to be as follows:

NATIVES OF	STRENGTH
	of the arm.		of the loins.
	Kilog.	lbs.	Myri.	lbs.
1. Van Diemen's Land.	50.6	101.2
2. New Holland.	50.8	101.6	10.2	208.08
3. Timor.	58.7	117.4	11.6	238.64
4. France.	69.2	138.4	15.2	310.08
5. England.	71.4	142.4	15.2	322.52

An instrument, invented by Dr. Paris, for the purpose of showing the quantity of active matter contained in a given weight or measure of any official compound, with the dose of any preparation, which will be equivalent in strength to a given quantity of any other of the same class. The instrument is more ingenious than useful.

Dysentérie, Dysentérie, Flux dysentérique, Flux de Sang.* Inflammation of the mucous membrane of the large intestine; the chief symptoms of which are:—fever, more or less inflammatory, with frequent mucous or bloody evacuations; violent tormina and tenesmus. When the evacuations do not contain blood, it has been called Dysenter'ia alba or simple Dysentery, Mico-dysenter'ia. The seat of the disease is, generally, in the colon and rectum. It occurs, particularly, during the summer and autumnal months, and in hot climates more than in cold: frequently, also, in camps and prisons, in consequence of impure air, and imperfect nourishment: and is often epidemic. Sporadic cases of dysentery are, generally, easily managed; but when the disease occurs epidemically, it often exhibits great malignancy. Generally, it yields to mild laxatives, as castor oil, combined with diaphoretic narcotics, such as the pulvis ipecacuanhæ compositus, and counter-irritants to the abdomen; but, at times, the inflammation runs on so speedily to ulceration, that, unless a new action be rapidly excited, death will be the consequence. In such cases, mercury must be rapidly introduced into the system, and narcotics may be combined with it.

The whole management in acute dysentery must, of course, be strictly antiphlogistic.

Catamenia passed with great local pain, especially in the loins:—with sometimes a membranous discharge. Dysmenorrhœa is very difficult of removal, and prevents conception. In the married female, if she should be able to pass one period without pain, and subsequently become pregnant, the morbid action may be broken in upon by gestation, and a perfect cure be obtained. Change of air, soon after marriage, will sometimes give occasion to this desirable result. The affection generally depends upon erethism of the interior of the uterus, called into action at each catamenial period. The violence of the pain requires the liberal use of narcotics.

A state of the stomach, in which its functions are disturbed, without the presence of other diseases, or when, if other diseases be present, they are of but minor importance. The symptoms of dyspepsia are very various. Those affecting the stomach itself are:—loss of appetite; nausea; pain in the epigastrium or hypochondrium; heart-burn; sense of fulness, or weight in the stomach; acrid or fetid eructations; pyrosis, and sense of fluttering or sinking at the pit of the stomach. The sympathetic affections are of the most diversified character. Dyspepsia, being generally of a functional nature, is devoid of danger. When arising from disease of the stomach itself, it is, of course, more serious.

It is usually dependent on irregularity of living; either in the quantity or quality of the food taken: and the most successful treatment is, to put the patient on a diet easy of digestion; to combat the causes, where such are apparent; and, by proper remedies and regimen, to strengthen the system in every practicable manner. A great error exists in regarding it as always a disease of debility. It is often connected with an inflammatory or subinflammatory condition of the mucous lining of the stomach, and of course a very different plan of treatment is required in the two cases. Dyspepsia is often attended with too great a secretion of the gastric acids; but, on other occasions, they would appear to be too small in quantity, so as to constitute alkaline indigestion or neutral indigestion.

EAR, Auris, Ous, ovs, Ac'oë, Saxon, eare, (Prov.) Lug. (F.) Oreille. The organ of audition. It is composed of a series of more or less irregular cavities, in which the sonorous rays are successively received and reflected, until they agitate the nerves which are destined to convey the impression to the brain. The ear is contained partly in the substance of the temporal bone; and a part projects externally, behind the joint of the lower jaw. It may be divided into three portions;—the outer or external ear, formed by the auricle and meatus auditorius; the middle ear, comprising the cavity of the tympanum and its dependencies; and the internal ear, comprehending the three semicircular canals, the cochlea and the vestibule; which, together, constitute the osseous labyrinth. Within the cavity of this labyrinth are contained membranes having nearly the shape of the vestibule and semicircular canals, but not extending into the cochlea. These membranes form the membranous labyrinth. Between the osseous and the membranous labyrinth is situate the liquor of Cotunnus, and within the membranous labyrinth is a fluid, termed, by De Blainville, vitrine auditive, from its supposed analogy to the vitreous humour of the eye. The form of the membranous vestibule is not an exact imitation of the osseous cavity, being composed of two distinct sacs, which open into each other,—the one termed the Sacculus vestibuli; the other Sacculus. Each sac contains in its interior a small mass of white calcareous matter resembling powdered chalk, which seems to be suspended in the fluid of the sacs by means of a number of nervous filaments proceeding from the auditory nerve. These are the otoconies and otolithes of Breschet.

The auditory nerve is distributed to the cavities of the internal ear.

A state in which certain ideas so completely absorb the mind, that the external sensations are suspended, the voluntary movements arrested, and even the vital action retarded. In catalepsy, there is, in addition, complete suspension of the intellectual faculties. This last condition is in general described as trance. See, also, luxation.

It may be owing to the retraction of the skin, after the cure of an ulcer, wound, or burn of the eyelid; or it may depend on tumefaction or relaxation of the conjunctiva. ECZEMA OF THE HAIRY SCALP, Eczema capitis, Vesicular scall, is often confounded with other affections, under the names Porrigio and Tinea, which are pustular, not vesicular, in their form. It occurs during dentition, and even afterwards, and the discharge is so profuse, that the head appears as if dipped in some glutinous liquid. By and by, the secretion dries into crusts and mats the hair into little separate tufts. The scalp gives evidence of inflammatory excitement, and the lymphatic ganglions of the neck are apt to become inflamed and suppurate.

A variety of humid scalled head, in which the humour from the excoeriated surface runs down upon the hairs, and encloses them in little silvery pellicles or sheaths, has received the name Asbestos Scall.

It has been occasionally employed with success in paralysis, rheumatism, accidental deafness, amaurosis, amenorrhœa, &c., but it is uncertain, and not much used; and the cases are not always clear in which it could be of service. It may be communicated by means of the electric bath—Bain électrique, as it has been called; which consists in placing the patient upon an insulated stool, and connecting him with the prime conductor, of which he thus becomes a part. The fluid may be communicated by points, sparks, or by shocks, according to the required intensity.

ELEPHANTIASIS, Elephantia, Elephantismus, Elephas, Lazarus morbus seu mulum, Phœnicæus morbus, Phymatosis Elephantiasis, from ελεφας, ελεφαντος, 'an elephant.' Various affections have been described under this name, by adding an epithet. It is ordinarily and generically applied to a condition, in which the skin is thick, livid, rugous, tuberculate, and insensible to feeling.

ELEPHANTIASIS OF THE ANTILLES, Barbadoes Leg, Glandular disease of Barbadoes, (F.) Jumbes de Barbade, is the Elephantiasis of many writers, Buene'mia. It is characterized by the leg being enormously tumid and misshapen; skin thickened, livid, and rugous, often scaly; scrotum, arms, or other parts sometimes participating in the affection. The Buene'mia Tropica, Cochin leg, is an affection of this kind.

ELEPHANTIASIS ARABICA, Tyriasis, Elephas, Elephantiasis, E. Indica, Elephantia Arabum, Lepra Arabum (of some), Maladie glandulaire, Ladrerie, Yava Skin of the Polynesians [?]. In this the tubercles are chiefly on the face and joints. There is loss of hair, except on the scalp; voice, hoarse and nasal; and the disease is said to be contagious and hereditary. It most frequently attacks the feet; and gives the lower extremity a fancied resemblance to the leg of an elephant, whence its name. The seat of the disease seems to be in the lymphatic vessels and glands, and in the subcutaneous areolar tissue; the inflammatory condition of which is accompanied with general morbid symptoms. Medicine has little or no effect on this loathsome complaint. See Lepra.

ELEPHANTIASIS OF CAYENNE, Mal rouge de Cayenne, seems to be a variety of Lepra, characterized by red and yellow spots, occupying the forehead, ears, hands, loins, &c., afterwards extending and becoming scaly, with deformity of the parts where they are seated, particularly of the face; and ultimately producing cracks, ulcers, caries, and sometimes death.

ELEPHANTIASIS OF THE GREEKS, E. Græcorum, is probably the same disease as Lepra.

ELEPHANTIASIS OF INDIA is characterized by red, livid, or yellowish spots, slightly prominent, to which succeed indolent tumours, formed in the areolar texture. At a more advanced period the phalanges swell, and become ulcerated; the bones of the nose carious, the lips thickened, and emaciation gradually carries off the patient. It likewise belongs to lepra.

ELEPHANTIASIS ITALICA, Pellagra.

ELEPHANTIASIS OF JAVA is likewise a variety of lepra, characterized by large white tumours on the toes and fingers, resembling serofulous tumefactions. These tumours ulcerate, and the ulcerations spread from the extremities towards the trunk, destroying even the bones. Amputation can alone arrest its progress. The disease is often accompanied by alopecia, and by an eruption of red spots.

ELEPHANTINUM EMPLASTRUM, Ελεφαντινον. An ancient plaster, composed of 30 parts of ceruss, 45 of wax, oil ℞ss, water ℞j.—Castelli. Oribasius and Celsus both mention a plaster of this name, but they are by no means similar in composition.

ELEVATOR, Levator, from elevare, (e, and levare), 'to lift up.' (F.) Élévateur. A muscle, whose function it is to raise the part into which it is inserted. See Levator.

ELEVATOR, Elevatorium, Vectis elevatorium, Élévatoire. A name given to different surgical instruments employed for raising portions of bone which have been depressed, for raising and detaching the portion of bone separated by the crown of the trepan, and for removing stumps of teeth.

ELEVATOR ANI, Levator ani—e. Labii inferioris, Levator labii inferioris—e. Labii superioris proprius, Levator labii superioris proprius—e. Labiorum communis, Levator anguli oris—e. Oculi, Rectus superior oculi—e. Patientiæ, Levator scapulæ—e. Scapulæ, Levator scapulæ—e. Testiculi, Cremaster—e. Urethræ, see Transversus perinæi.

ELEVATOR, COMMON. This is a mere lever, the end of which is somewhat bent and made rough, in order that it may less readily slip away from the portion of bone which is to be raised. The instrument is used, by forming a fulcrum for it, either on the hand which holds it, or upon the fingers of the other hand; or by making a fixed point for it on the edge of the opening made with the trephine.

ELEVATOR OF LOUIS differed from the last only in the circumstance of the screw-peg being united to the bridge by a kind of pivot instead of hinge, so that greater extent of motion was permitted.

ELEVATOR OF PETIT consists of a lever mounted on a handle, and straight throughout its whole length, except at its very end, which is slightly curved, in order that it may be more conveniently put under the portion of bone intended to be elevated. The lever is pierced at various distances from its butt-end with several holes, intended for the reception of a movable screw-peg, fixed on the top of a kind of bridge. This part of the instrument consists of an arch, the ends of which are long, and covered with small pads, and on its centre is the screw-peg already mentioned. By means of these holes the arm of the lever can be lengthened at pleasure.

ELEVATOR, TRIP'LOID, Vectis triploïdes. This was so called from its consisting of three branches, uniting above in one common trunk. The latter part was traversed by a long screw, having below a kind of hook, and above a handle for turning it. By turning the screw, the hook was drawn up, and the bone thus elevated.

The simple lever is the only one now used, owing to the want of facility and advantages in the use of the others.

EM'ETINE, Emet'ina, Emet'ia, Vom'itine, Cephœlinum. A vegetable alkali, discovered by M. Pelletier in ipecacuanha, and to which it owes its emetic power. It is obtained from different ipeacuanhas, but chiefly from psychot'ria emet'ica, callicoc'ea ipeacuan'ha, and vi'ola emet'ica. It is in transparent scales, of a reddish-brown colour, almost inodorous, of a bitter, slightly acid taste; is unchangeable in the air, soluble in water and alcohol, and insoluble in ether. Three grains of impure emetia or one grain of pure are equal to 18 of ipeacuanha. See Ipeacuanha.

A name given to medicines believed to have the power of favouring the discharge of the menses. There is probably no substance which possesses this power directly. According to different conditions of the system, the most opposite remedies may act as emmenagogues. Black hellebore, savin, madder, polygala senega, and ergot, are reputed to be specific emmenagogues. The following list comprises the chief of them:—Conila Pulegioides; Helleborus Niger; Mentha Pulegium; Rosmarinus; Rubia; Sabina; Secale Cornutum; Senega, and Tanacetum.

relax and soften parts that are inflamed, or too tense. They are used both internally and externally: as the former, however, consist of mucilaginous substances, they are generally reckoned as demulcents; the latter, or proper emollients, consist of oils, cataplasms, fomentations, &c. Oleaginous bodies, rubbed on a part, act by diminishing its cohesion. Fomentations, in cases of internal inflammation, act probably through contiguous sympathy. The following are the chief emollients:—Adeps; Amygdalæ Oleum; Avenæ Farina; Cera; Cetaceum; Linum; Olivæ Oleum; Sesamum; Tritici Farina, and Ulmus.

This term is commonly applied to any white, crepitant, shining, elastic, indolent tumour of the integuments, caused by the introduction of air into the areolar texture, Aërodermectā'sia. Injuries of the larynx, trachea, or lungs; fractures of the ribs, or wounds penetrating the chest, are the most frequent causes of this affection, which is owing to the air escaping from the air-passages, and insinuating itself into the areolar texture surrounding the wound. There are some cases of emphysema, which are owing to internal causes; and hence a division has been made into the accidental and symptomatic, and the spontaneous and idiopathic.

EMPHYSEMA ABDOMINIS, Tympanites.

EMPHYSEMA OF THE LUNGS, E. Pulmo'num, Asthma aëreum ab Emphyse'matē Pulmo'num, Pneumatō'sis Pulmo'num, Pneumonec'tasis, Pneumec'tasis, (F.) Pneumoëctasie, Emphyse'me du Poupon. A considerable pressure or contusion of the chest, or any violent concussion of the lung, may produce a laceration in that viscus, without injury being done to the parietes of the thorax, and may give place to the infiltration of air into the areolar texture, interlob'ular emphysema. Laënnec has described another species of emphysema of the lungs, Vesic'ular emphysema, Aëropneumonasie, Aëropneumonectasie of Piorry, consisting in excessive dilatation of the air-cells, some of which become as large as hemp-seed, ultimately break, and give rise to irregular vesicles at the surface of the lung, some of which are as large as a hazel-nut. Physical signs. The thorax externally, generally or locally, appears unnaturally convex and prominent. The intercostal spaces are widened, but depressed. The inspiratory efforts are increased. The sound on percussion is morbidly clear, but not tympanitic. On auscultation, the inspiratory murmur is feeble or suppressed. The expiration, which is more frequently audible, is prolonged, laborious and wheezing. There are no certain physical signs which can distinguish interlobular emphysema from the vesicular.

Emphysema under the pleuro-pulmonalis is termed, by Piorry, Aërethymopneumonie.

EMPHYTUM THERMUM, Biolychnium.

EMPIRIC, Emp'iricus, from εμπειρια, (ev, and πειρα, 'a trial,') 'experience.' One who follows only experience. A sect of physicians, who rejected all theory, and took for their guide experience alone. It was opposed to the dogmatic sect. The Empiric sect prevailed till near the time of Galen. Among its most eminent members, after Phyllinus and Serapion, were Apollonius, Glaucias, Bacchius of Tanagra, and Zeuxis, both disciples of Herophilus,—Heraclides of Tarentum, Cleophantus, master of Asclepiades, Menodotus of Nicomedia, and Theudas of Laodicea. They occupied themselves, chiefly, with discovering the properties of drugs, and did important service, in this manner, to medicine.

At the present day, the word Empiric is only taken in a bad sense, being employed in nearly the same signification as charlatan or quack.

EMPIRICE, Empiricism.

EMPIR'ICISM; same etymon. Emp'irica Ars, Emp'iricē, (F.) Empirisme. Medicine founded on experience. It generally, at the present day, signifies quackery.

EMPLAS'TRUM, from the Greek εμπλασσω, (ev, and πλασσω, 'to form,') 'I spread upon,' (F.) Emplâtre, Stéaraté. A solid and tenacious compound, adhesive at the ordinary heat of the human body. Some of the plasters owe their consistence to wax and resin; and others to the chemical union which takes place between the semivitreous oxide of lead and oil. Most of them become too consistent by age. When such is the case, they may be remedied by a gentle heat, and oil be added to them.
